Clinton: Union Strongest Ever

Clinton touted Medicare and gun control in his final State of the Union speech late Thursday evening.

Wire Reports

WASHINGTON - President Bill Clinton opened an ambitious State of the Union address Thursday night by touting economic prosperity and social progress, declaring that "the state of our union is the strongest it has ever been."

And, he says, the credit belongs to the American people.

Before launching into his agenda for the last year of his administration, Clinton reflected on past accomplishments ranging from a smaller federal workforce, to the end of "Welfare as we know it," to a decline in crime.

"America," Clinton said, "again has the confidence to dream big dreams."

Then, the president turned to his call for a "21st century American revolution," asking for more investment in education, including $1 billion for the HeadStart program for low-income children.

He also called for a "new teacher quality initiative," more charter schools, more Internet connections in schools, and a tax deduction to "make four years of college affordable for all."

Clinton then moved on to the theme of families, touting the Children's Health Insurance Program and asking Congress to "follow Vice President Gore's suggestion to make low-income parents eligible for the insurance that covers their kids."

He touched on Medicare reform, including a plan to extend coverage to include prescription drugs.

Clinton proposed reducing the so-called "marriage penalty" and called for expanding tax credits for families with more than two children.

He also touched on equality in male-female pay, child care initiatives and what he called "tough new measures" to hold absentee fathers responsible for child support.

The president then moved on to crime, calling on Congress to "make America the safest big country in the world."

Clinton invoked the Columbine tragedy to call again for tougher gun laws, introducing Tom Mauser, whose 15-year-old son was killed in the shooting.

The president said that Mauser's "courage and wisdom" should move Congress to make gun safety legislation a top priority.

The president asked Congress to open new markets "in our inner cities, poor rural areas, and on Indian reservations."

He proposed the creation of more Empowerment Zones, saying, "this is not a Democratic or a Republican issue, it is an American issue."

He also urged a stronger "safety net" for family farmers, and called for closing the "digital divide" between people with Internet access and those without it.

Clinton then turned to American leadership in the international community, calling for a new consensus on trade and for promoting trade initiatives in Africa and in the Caribbean.

He said America should support Russians "struggling for a democratic, prosperous future," but called the war in Chechnya "cruel and self-defeating."

He also called on Congress to support bringing China into the World Trade Organization.

He touted America's role in the Middle East peace process, thanked the U.S. armed forces for stopping "the ethnic cleansing in Kosovo," and called for the ratification of the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty.

Clinton also called on America to help more nations fight AIDS and other health problems, and asked the private sector to help.

He then touched on environmental issues such as global warming, and touted scientific advances in genetic research and superfast computers.

He asked for a $3 billion increase in research funding, "to accelerate the march of discovery across all disciplines of science and technology."

Later, he spoke out against hate crimes, citing recent high-profile attacks on blacks, homosexuals and Jews.

"This is not the American way," he said. "We must draw the line."

Clinton again presented himself as an activist president, despite being in the final year of his second term, facing an election-minded Congress whose Republican majority impeached him a little over a year ago.

"I think there are many who think (the address) this year will be short on programmatic and long on visionary" ideas," said White House Deputy Chief of Staff Maria Echaveste.
