Harvard Law Gets Personal

By JENNIFER SAMUELS

Harvard Law School recently unveiled sweeping changes to make the first-year experience for students more individualized.

But UNC officials say changes at the top-notch law school will not affect the actions of UNC administrators.

Harvard Law will spend $20 million next fall to decrease class sizes and create smaller units, called "colleges," within the department.

Steve Armini, Harvard Law spokesman, said students and faculty feel small classes will be beneficial, allowing smaller groups of students to participate in everything from advising to intramural sports. He said that because Harvard is one

He said that because Harvard is one of the nation's largest law schools, it must try to provide students with a personal-ized learning experience. "Harvard Law has the best of both worlds," Armini said. "We are able to maintain the benefits of a large law school while simulta-
