way to bring a large group of people together and to expose them to cultures and groups they might not be familiar with," said Jarrett York, a senior psychology major from Winston-Salem who performed in the BSM's timeline of African-American history.

Organizers said they were thrilled by both the turnout and the success of the event. "The crowd was great, and I think all the performers did a really good job," Rezvani said.

And as the organizers had intended, some students left the program impressed by the diversity at UNC.

"I didn't realize so many groups were represented on campus," said Sarah Hossli, a freshman business major from High Point. "It's really cool to see so many different types of people come together to create something so powerful."

pedestrian safety and loss of parking.

Estroff said dealing with the student-related issues discussed at the meeting will require compromise. "We are entering a new era on campus," she said. "It is a time when all of us will need to be willing to give a little bit more."

INCREASES

Because money will go to increased financial aid as well as recruiting faculty, Nichol said he doesn't see any negative effects arising from the increases.

"To increase tuition, it's not desirable," he said. "(But) I don't think it will hurt the law school's accessibility."

Hunter Pierce, a senior biology major from Wilmington who intends to apply to the dental school, said tuition increases will not affect his goals.

He also believes the increases are a necessary option. "I really can't see it as being a detriment in any way," he said.

Nate Macek, a graduate student from Michigan in the Department of City and Regional Planning, said he respects the tuition increase's necessity.

He said that if out-of-state tuition were to increase, it might affect his decision when he decides to apply for law school, where he will face out-of-state tuition bills. But Macek said the quality of the schools' programs would bear more weight in his future decision. "I think there's room for tuition to increase to stay competitive," he said.

It is this aspect that Houpt believes is most essential. "It's really going to improve the quality of life for the student."
