

Napster Tightens Security, Scrambles to Obey Court Order

The Associated Press

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Napster's Internet-based song-swapping service went dark Monday as the company continued to upgrade its network in preparation for advanced music-identification tools and the launch of a fee-based system required by a recent decision in the U.S. Supreme Court.

"File transfers have been temporarily suspended while Napster upgrades the databases that support our new file identification technology," a message on Napster's home page read Monday. "Keep checking this space for updates."

Added the message, "Thanks for your support!"

The Redwood City-based company has been scrambling in recent months to comply with a federal court-issued injunction to keep unauthorized music offline.

Napster representatives did not immediately return calls seeking comment on the status of the system changes.

The company has begun playing hardball lately with its users, who have long traded MP3 file versions of popular music with little regard to copyright issues.

After complaints by the recording industry, Napster was forced to change some of its policies.

The latest version of the Napster application, a forced upgrade to the system, no longer allows the use of previous versions. The new system contains filtering technology to identify song files accurately, preventing users from trading copyrighted songs on the system.

The result has been a drastic drop in the number of songs shared and the number of users sharing them.

According to technology researcher Webnoize, just 320,000 users logged onto Napster's service on June 27, sharing an average of only 1.5 songs each. It was a dramatic drop from the average 1.57 million users who logged on, sharing an average of 220 songs each, at the peak of the service in February.

"The new client is being used to test Napster's fingerprinting technology for the company's planned commercial service," said Webnoize senior analyst Matt Bailey.

"By further reducing the music available through the current service, Napster has provided another nail in the coffin of the service consumers originally loved."

No specific launch date has yet been specified for the new fee-based Napster, but German media giant Bertelsmann AG, Napster's primary financial backer, has promised the company will unveil it by the end of this summer.
