rock, paper, scissors.

Ramses and the Duke Blue Devil hammed it up on the Robertson Scholars bus as they joined Chancellor James Moeser, Duke President Nan Keohane and the inaugural class of freshmen scholars to take part in the launch of the express bus service between the two campuses.

The 10.7-mile bus ride to UNC's campus came after a ribbon-cutting cerony in front of Duke Chapel.

"I am immensely impressed with how traffic moved out of the way for the Robertson Scholars bus," Moeser said as he addressed the crowd of scholars and administrators gathered on the terrace overlooking the Morehead Planetarium parking lot.

"I'm proud to be affiliated with Duke and this great program."

Keohane also said she was impressed with the smooth bus ride and how it gave her a chance to engage in casual conversation with Moeser.

"I hope the bus offers the same opportunity for lots of colleagues," ohane said.

The bus ride also gave the scholars a chance to catch up with each other. Many had not seen each other since the scholarship selection process in April.

"I was sitting next to a UNC scholar, and we just talked about school stuff like we were in the same school," said fresh-man Pauline Wong, a scholar from Duke. "It's been great between the UNC and Duke scholars. There really hasn't been any separation."

Wyndham Robertson said she was grateful that the bus ride gave her the opportunity to meet the scholars. She is the sister of Julian Robertson, who provided a $24 million endowment gift for the program.

"I loved being on the bus ride," said Robertson, who is a member of the program's external advisory board.

Robertson said the two universities share a great athletic rivalry, but she hopes the scholarship program will extend the existing cooperation beyond the administrative level.

"I buy my brother's school of thought that there needs to be something that pulls undergraduates together."

Speaker Dies at 82

MARSHALL - Liston B. Ramsey, a mountain populist who became perhaps the most powerful state House speaker in North Carolina history, died Sunday.

Dot Barber, Ramsey's secretary for 31 years, said the former speaker died after a long illness.

Ramsey served 19 terms in the state House representing Madison County as a Democrat. From 1981 to 1988, he held a record four terms as its speaker.

Ramsey was on his way to a fifth term as speaker in 1989 when he was unseated by a coalition of 20 dissident Democrats and Republicans in the House. The dissidents had chafed under the centralization of power under Ramsey and his lieutenants.

By then, he was a legendary political

Ramsey was first elected to the House in 1960 and again in 1962. After being defeated in 1964, he returned to win election again in 1966 and every two years after that, through 1998.

He announced his retirement in 2000, when he was the longest serving ember of the General Assembly. Gov. Mike Easley said Ramsey was a 'good friend and a true statesman" for North Carolina.

"He was respected as a progressive leader who always watched out for the common man," Easley said in a statement.

"During his reign, Speaker Ramsey was responsible for developing a long list of leaders who carry on his commit-ment and dedication to serving the people of North Carolina."
