the corporate presence on campus.

He said Wednesday that he was pleased with the delicate way the chancellor handled the money issue.

"The reason he's going out to do this is to make Carolina the best university it can be," he said. "I think (Moeser's) focus and heart are in the right place. I know deep down that the focus for those (fund-raising) drives has the best interests of the University at heart."

Young said he was generally pleased with the speech and the plan the chancellor had laid out before the University.

"Overall, it's hard to sit there and not be reinvigorated about the vision of the University," he said. "I think Chancellor Moeser has a lot going for the growth of the University and the direction it takes."

we want to do even more to get Carolina-created technology into the hands of the public, and our goal is to create our own venture capital fund and incubator space to further stimulate this kind of activity."

Moeser also said Provost Robert Shelton will lead the development of a new academic plan. He stressed that the University should continue its scientific progress but that the arts and humanities must not be left behind. "I do not believe that we can be America's best public university on the strength of science alone," he said. "This university has not nurtured the arts as it should."

Moeser also said he would like to see global-centered programs and public service incorporated into the University's academic mission.

But Moeser did not spend his entire speech reflecting on internal concerns — he also discussed the University's role in the town and the nation. He mentioned the Master Plan, the University's blueprint for campus growth, and the Development Plan, a document pending approval by the town of Chapel Hill that details the effects of that growth during its first eight years, saying he was pleased with the process so far but was worried about some recent developments. "All of us have concerns about growth," he said. "I remain hopeful that we can continue to work productively."

The Chapel Hill Planning Board recommended Tuesday night that the Town Council not support the Development Plan unless at least 33 stipulations are met.

Moeser also expressed concern about how the University is perceived by the nation. He said the quality of a school has nothing to do with how magazines and their readers perceive it. "If you must, read what (U.S. News and World Report) has to say about us," he said of the magazine's rankings, to be released today. "But let us not for a second be diverted by these arbitrary and artificial ratings from the substance of our vision for excellence."

He closed his speech with wishes that UNC-CH be a model, not for its rankings, but for its moral stature and principles.

"We have a moral responsibility to our state and our nation as a public university to bring to the public square the great issues of our day without fear of censorship," he said. "In so doing, we are faithful to our own traditions of excellence, engagement and leadership. And thus, the University that became the model for public higher education in America will again be leading the way, to be the 'light on the hill' for America and the world."
