unnamed business at what he called a "prime location."
Mueller said he appealed the original decision on behalf of his students who park in the lot.
"I am trying to help the people who park there," he said.
"I didn't feel town's elect was correct, and it was an issue worth standing up for."

Hemmings said Mueller appealed the case to avoid more litigation about refunding the students' money.
Three UNC students, including Guyton and Kinlaw, are currently involved in a lawsuit to reclaim the money they gave Mueller for spaces they say were falsely advertised.
"It's good for the safety of the students," Guyton said.
"I think they're better off."

BREAK-INS

can do is make other people think that someone is home," he said.
In addition to basic precautions such as locking doors and windows, Englehardt suggested buying lamp timers that can automatically turn lights off and on.
He also advised leaving a radio turned on and have it tuned to a talk station to make potential intruders think people are talking inside.
He encouraged students not to leave valuables or electronics in view of a window and said that laptop computers should always be taken home. Cars should be left completely empty.
"Don't leave anything in them," Englehardt said.
He also said students should try to let as few people as possible know that the house is empty.
"The fewer people that know you're gone, the better," he said.
Gita Madan, a sophomore biology major who lives in an apartment in Southern Village, said her building's security system will help prevent break-ins.
"We're going to lock the door, but no one can enter the building without punching a code in," she said.
Samuel Culberson, a senior psychology major, said he thinks the holiday break does put off-campus student residences more at risk for break-ins.

But Culberson said he is not worried because God has everything under control.

He said, "If something gets stolen, that person obviously needs the object more than I do."
