lowest average salaries - are both below $62,000 a year.

Faculty Council Chairwoman Sue Estroff said because most professional schools set their own tuition levels, funds from a tuition increase will probably not go to increase the salaries of professors who teach professional-level courses.

"Because professional schools can set their own tuition levels, it's a whole other story as far as salaries at those schools," Estroff said.

Shelton said most of the revenue will be given to Arts and Sciences. Shelton said the method of distributing tuition funds based on how far each depart-ment's average salary lags behind that of its peers was used to allocate funds from a $600 tuition increase passed in February 2000 by the UNC-system Board of Governors to raise faculty salaries.

"We didn't want to move everyone the same amount forward in dollars," Shelton said. "We wanted to move every Shelton said. We wanted to move every-one the same distance in closing the gap." Shelton said each department has its own salary funds distribution policy set by the department head, although UNC-CH administrators would encourage the money to be distributed to pro-fessors as a reward for merit.

He said the tuition increases imple mented in the fall of 2000 and of 2001 mented in the fail of 2000 and of 2001 reduced the gap between each department's average salary and its peer institutions' by one-third.

But the $14,000 salary gap that exists between Arts and Sciences faculty and at UNC-CH's peer institutions makes funding salaries an urgent need, said Dee Reid, communications director for the college.

"Forty faculty members in the College of Arts and Sciences received offers from other major universities in the last year alone," Reid said.

"We need faculty salaries to be more competitive with our peer institutions.

at the rally, Young said.

Young said students from N.C. State University also are planning to attend the rally. He said N.C. State students are concerned about the impact that an increase in UNC-CH's tuition might have on the cost of their tuition as well.

"A tuition increase at (UNC-CH) could change the face of affordability and access for the whole (UNC) system," he said. Young said student involvement in decisions about tuition is crucial.
"Making these decisions in a closed room without involvement from the people who are affected is irresponsible."

But Kleysteuber said the demonstra-tors will not try to disrupt the meeting. "Our theme is not anger, it's informed disagreement.'
