ing extremely hard," Rouhanifard said. Brian Fauver, vice chairman of the Board of Elections, said polls will be open online at Student Central from 7 a.m. until 10 p.m. and a polling site will be open from 9 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. in Union 212. The student body president election is open to all students, and rising seniors or second-year students with junior standing can vote for senior class president. According to elections board data, 5,081 students voted in last year's runoff compared to 5,387 in the general election. Fauver said the runoff results this year might mirror last year's trend of lower turnout during a runoff. "This year's runoff votes might be less than the 7,421 ballots cast in the general election, but since the turnout was so high this year the turnout might be really close."

responded differently was the idea of a public service distinction on graduating students' diplomas. Daum said she sees the distinction as rewarding students who already have a strong commitment to public service. "Students already do a lot of public service on this campus," she said. McKinney said public service should be incorporated into C-TOPS, but he does not support a public service distinction because he thinks it might taint students' motivations for service. As this year's search for a student body president comes to an end, both candidates said in Monday's forum they have no regrets. "We've done the best we could," McKinney said. Daum said, "I don't think I would have done anything differently."

Brown Pitches Senate Campaign Ideas to Young Democrats

By EMMA BURGIN
Staff Writer

Cynthia Brown, who is running for the Democratic nomination for North Carolina's 2002 U.S. Senate race, spoke in front of the UNC Young Democrats on Monday about the economy and other platform issues. Brown, a former Durham City Council member, is running against former White House Chief of Staff Erskine Bowles; N.C. Rep. Dan Blue, D-Wake; and N.C. Secretary of State Elaine Marshall to secure the Democratic bid for the Senate seat being vacated by Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C. Brown said her campaign has three prongs: economic security, guaranteed healthcare and environmental justice.

Elections 2002

Brown, criticized by some for her lack of political experience, said her electoral strength lays in her local involvement. "I am a community advocate seeking to run for political office," she said. "I have had extensive experience outside of the political process at the local, state and national levels. Some people suggest I don't have the political experience. I suggest that is quite untrue." Brown said her platform is based on community need and that her election would ensure an advocate for the people's voice. "I take my platform ideas by listening to the communities," she said.

"The outcome of this election would be a real people's candidate. This is more than running for Senate - this is about building people power." Brown responded to several questions about one of her campaign goals - raising the minimum wage from $5.15 to $8.50 an hour during a two-year period. "For me, it becomes an issue of basic decency," Brown said. "I look at the distribution of wealth, and it becomes unfair." Another of Brown's main points Monday was excess money spent on the military. She pointed to President Bush's recent decision to significantly increase military spending in his budget proposal. "That feels off to me," she said. "What are we trying to do with that money? It's about military contractors making multimillion dollar contracts. Our priorities are really out of line." Brown said she knows her campaign faces a rocky road, but she believes her faith will carry her through. "I am relying more on the faith of God, than the faith of the voters," she said. "But that's just who I am."
