"What we can find out is what is working here," he said. "When you look at a list of well-qualified teachers, North Carolina has led the country in making sure there are qualified teachers in every class. North Carolina students are making more rapid progress than students in any other part of the nation."

The meeting consisted of a series of round-table discussions highlighting teacher development and early childhood education, with representatives of educational programs giving their input to Kennedy.

Molly Broad, president of the UNC system, emphasized the importance of developing high quality teachers. "We are building partnerships with community able housing for University employees. Alderman Diana McDuffee said Szostak is the first to take advantage of the affordable housing incentives entailed in the town's most recently passed development ordinance.

But McDuffee said the percentages stipulated by the development ordinance could be adjusted through measures that encourage developers to provide more affordable housing.

"We can't require developers to build affordable housing, but we can encourage diversity of housing by giving bonuses to developers that build affordable housing," McDuffee said.

The bonus for developers who agree to incorporate affordable housing is an increased quota of houses that they are allowed to build.

The bonus policy allows a builder to construct smaller, more affordable houses, which saves money for the developer.

Carrboro Town Manager Robert Morgan said he is optimistic about the new development.

"The negotiations are still going on, and there are no plans cemented."

"But it looks like a good balance."

colleges and working on the professional development of teachers from their first day to the day they retire," she said.

The officials pointed to many state programs established to further the education of residents, including the N.C. Teaching Fellows Program. The program funds college scholarships for four years for students who plan to become in-state teachers.

JoAnn Norris, associate executive director of the program, said 400 out of more than 2,000 applicants were selected this year for scholarships.

Norris said there are many benefits to the programs. "Teaching Fellows are in a school by second semester learning about the culture of schooling," she said. "This is the strongest advantage of preparation. They have four years of college to learn about it. They have to be adapted to teach the skills."

Don Bailey, director of the Frank Porter Graham Child Development Institute, said many students are not adequately prepared for kindergarten. "Unfortunately these (unprepared) children are predominantly poor and from ethnic minority groups," he said. "They come out of a home environment of poor quality."

Carmen Hooker Odom, secretary of the N.C. Department of Health and Human Services, said the problem could be eased through cooperation between different state agencies and additional funding to support child-care programs.

"We need to relax regulations to enable flexibility and to be able to blend the money," she said.

Karen Ponder, director of the N.C. Partnership for Children, said it is important for local community members to play an active role in education.

"The main thing is when you allow a local community to look at needs," Ponder said. "They bring to that much more than we can ever solve at a state level. The brilliance is in the state oversight and local decision-making."

special emergency meeting of the BOT. But before specific plans will be developed, Moeser said he will discuss the new proposal with University vice chancellors today in the administrators' normally scheduled weekly meeting.

Moeser said he does not know what process will be employed to guide the modified parking plan or what direction the new proposal will take.

He did not specify any elements that might be included in the new plan, saying it was too early to get a sense of its content.

But he did emphasize the importance of other UNC officials in creating the new plan. "The proposal doesn't come from me but from the people who have developed it before."

and hear the different ideas so that we can take in all the pertinent information."

Rand said the UNC system will always be forced to make substantial fiscal decisions because of the caliber of its professional schools. "We have the competing interests of money to keep the programs competitive on a level versus keeping the university balanced," he said.

Warwick said he thinks there is little to no data that could support the arguments of UNC-CH's professional schools. "We'll certainly listen to what they're saying if anyone submits anything that shows our schools aren't competitive with comparable quality schools," he said.

Warwick also noted that financial aid for students will total more in 2002 than ever before. "I doubt that based on my personal knowledge they would be able to show that we aren't competitive at this time," he said. "We don't believe we're pricing ourselves out of the market."
