Cannon said students must meet with the undergraduate director of studies, who reviews the syllabus of the course and decides whether to count the course as a general requirement or a major requirement.

"There are usually not so many problems fulfilling the general requirements."

MEETING

Several committee officials said additional measures could be taken if the drought worsens.

"We're not to worst-case scenario yet," said committee Chairwoman Ellen Jones. "But the reality is, unless we can start doing rain dances and miraculously get it to rain, the only water we're going to have is what we can conserve. It's a community problem, and we all need to get involved."

The community is calling on all aspects of the University, including on-campus housing, Greek houses and Granville Towers, to work together to help with the drought, said Ray DuBose, UNC's director of energy services.

But the University's tight budget is also having an effect on conservation movements.

"Right now we are focusing on water conservation methods that don't cost a lot of money," DuBose said.

Already, 300 water-free urinals have been ordered to be installed in high-use areas, like the Student Union and Davis Library, and water is being trucked in to water the grass at Kenan Stadium.

Members asked that students reduce their personal water use and report leaks on campus.

"This is a long-term problem," DuBose said. "We're going to be under these restrictions until further notice."

SCHOOLS

Lee also said he thinks the new pharmacy school would be a good way to "raise the standard" of other UNC-system campuses.

"A stand-alone school would elevate the standing of Elizabeth City State better than a dependent school," Lee said.

Officials at Elizabeth City State said the new pharmacy school would have helped the school increase its enrollment.

The campus is one of seven targeted by UNC-system officials as a focused-growth institution.

Despite the scarcity of extra funds, Senate Majority Leader Tony Rand, D-Cumberland, said he expects the pharmacy school proposal to come before the Senate again in the future.

He said, "It is the general nature of man for these types of things to reappear from time to time."

STUDY ABROAD

University was suspended because of political turmoil.

Nielsen said these instances are rare. "All of our programs are very safe," he said. "If we consider the situation not safe enough, we will suspend the program."

Madge Hubbard, deputy director of study abroad, said UNC will suspend a program whenever there is a U.S. State Department travel warning to that country.

Nielsen said he is not surprised that the attacks of Sept. 11 have not had that great of an impact on study abroad program.

But he said foreign students coming to UNC through exchange programs are finding it difficult because of new visa restrictions put in place after the attacks.

UNC-CH's study abroad program offers 200 programs in more than 60 countries. So far, more than 350 applications have been turned in.

The original deadline for applications was Sept. 13, but the deadline has been extended to Oct. 1 for several programs with open spaces.

Nielsen said a deadline extension is not unusual.

"It always takes a while before we get a mass number of applicants for our new programs," he said.

There are still openings in all of the Asian programs, the Lorenzo de Medici program in Florence and the program in Argentina.
