Officers serve local residents

Don aprons to aid Special Olympics

Bill Frick laid down his badge, threw on an apron and picked up an armful of pitchers filled with iced tea, water and soft drinks Saturday at the Carolina Brewery.

Frick, a retired investigator from the Chapel Hill Police Department, was a "waiter" in the brewery's Tip-A-Cop program, which raises money for the Special Olympics by having officers serve drinks and collect their tips.

The program was started by Red Lobster in 2002 to help the Special Olympics through the volunteer efforts of local cops.

As he chatted and laughed with customers, who munched on their fries and sandwiches, Frick said volunteering allows him to see the positive outcomes of his actions.

"You don't see too many police officers very much filling waters and refilling iced teas, helping spread good will," said the brewery's general manager, Matthew Clements. "We're helping together to raise funds for a fantastic cause."

The Tip-A-Cop program was one of a flurry of festivities for the Carolina Brewery's 10th anniversary last week.

"One of our goals for the week was to give back to the community," owner Robert Poitras said, adding that he has benefited from being a part of the Chapel Hill business community.

Poitras is a member of the Chapel Hill Police Department's local board, which spearheads the Law Enforcement Torch Run for the Special Olympics program.

The group raises money for the organization through the Tip-A-Cop program, raffles for Duke and UNC basketball tickets and golf tournaments.

Tip-A-Cop collected more than $600 Saturday, and the raffle made about $500. All the funds will go to the Special Olympics.

The brewery also supports other local charities, such as the UNC Lineberger Comprehensive Cancer Center and Project Graduation.

But Clements said the Special Olympics, which provides year-round sports competition and training for more than 37,000 athletes, is a particularly good cause.

"It's amazing what it brings out in athletes. It gives them a goal and helps with development in human beings," Clements said. "It's amazing how happy they are when they cross that finish line."

Dani Kinert, a golf champion in the Special Olympics and a global messenger and volunteer for the organization, attended the volunteer event Saturday.

She said that fund-raisers and athletic opportunities like the Special Olympics have given her great memories.

She remembered almost hitting a hole-in-one during a Torch Run Golf Tournament when her golf ball bounced off of a rock.

"I was saying 'go in, go in,'" she remembered.

As an athlete and a volunteer, she said she can experience and contribute to the benefits of the Tip-A-Cop program firsthand.

"It just makes me feel good to volunteer and not just stick at home," she said about the volunteer opportunity. "I like to help the community."

SBP must balance administrative role

Serves as unified voice for students

BY DON CAMPBELL
STAFF WRITER

The winner of Tuesday's runoff election for student body president will have to wear "two hats" as soon as he steps into his new role.

Besides being the voice of the student body, an effective president must be aware of the other administrative aspects of the University, said Richard "Stick" Williams, chairman of the Board of Trustees.

"We've had five different (student body presidents) during the time that I've been on the board, and several, I think, have been very, very effective," Williams said, noting the accomplishments of former student body presidents.

He praised Student Body President Matt Calabria and his predecessors, Matt Tepper and Jen

Daum, for their ability to focus on more than student issues and to understand the intricacies of the University.

"In addition to representing the student voice, it should be somebody who is going to take the time to really study the issues that affect the University ... somebody that really gets in there and does their homework and understands their issues," Williams said.

Trustee Roger Perry maintained that being a consensus-builder for the student body should still be the president's focus.

"We understand the constituency he (or she) represents is perhaps the most important of all," Perry said. "The student body president gives us the pulse beat of the University. He (or she) helps us understand their issues, trends and experiences."

Board member Jean Kitchin also said that as the voice of the students, the student body president offers a perspective integral to the Board of Trustees. "We give the student body president's opinion a lot of weight," she said.

The candidates in Tuesday's student body president runoff, Seke Ballard and Seth Dearmin, haven't regularly attended trustee meetings, and both were absent during the last meeting when trustees passed a tuition proposal.

Several trustees said they aren't familiar with either of the hopefuls, though the candidates' platforms state that they want to work closely with the board.

Calabria said earning the trust of the Board of Trustees was at the crux of his presidency.

"The trust and respect of the Board of Trustees is something continually earned over time," he said. "Not only do they have to trust the person, but from day one, you have to make sure your ideas are sound and carefully thought out. It's more important that they trust the message."

Drawing from her experiences, Daum echoed this ideal.

"It was an ongoing goal to earn complete trust and the board's respect," she said. "But any student that goes in with an open mind and the understanding that the Board of Trustees has the school's best interest at heart will do fine."

Past student body presidents said the transformation from student to administrator can be intimidating, but Perry downplayed the difficulty of the transition onto the board.

"We were all clueless when we first got here," he said. "There's a learning process for all of the trustees."

Calabria said that after he gained acceptance with the board, trustees were receptive to what he brought to the table.

"Our ideas were definitely well-received," he said. "At no point did I feel that nobody was listening."

Calabria said he felt confident that this year's candidates would work effectively with the board.

"I trust that (Ballard and Dearmin) are very qualified," he said. "Both have talked to me with their ideas, and I'm confident either would do fine."

Kitchin shared Calabria's faith.

"I'm sure the next student body president will be great," she said. "They have always been in the past. It continues to reaffirm the respect and admiration I have for young people today."
