Student fees could be on the rise again.

The Chancellor's Committee on Student Fees recommended two undergraduate increases Friday — $8 for Student Health Service and $2 for campus recreation.

This year, undergraduates paid $1,408.02 for student fees. If the committee passes all the proposed fee recommendations, students could see a $170.05 increase next year. This would follow the $155.50 increase last year.

All of the fees recommended by the committee require approval by the University's Board of Trustees and the UNC-system Board of Governors before being charged to students.

The potential $8 health service fee increase would cover inflationary operating costs of health service. If approved by both boards, the total health service fee will be $346.

The committee also recommended a $2 addition to the campus recreation fee to go toward field maintenance for campus club and intramural sports. The potential increase would bring the total campus recreation fee to $36.

A graduate school request for a $3 fee for the graduate school language proficiency exam also was recommended. Stephanie Schmitt, assistant dean for academics of the graduate school, said the fee will help cover the administrative costs of proctoring the exam.

After discussing the various fees, the committee addressed issues raised by Luke Farley, speaker of Student Congress, about the process of approving student fees.

Farley said during the meeting that he thinks certain fees should be approved by Student Congress before going to the committee.

"All fees are not created equal," Farley said. "Some are imposed on us, and others we impose on ourselves, and those ought to be treated differently."

Farley pointed to Title One of the Student Code, which grants Student Congress the power to determine specific fees delegated by the code.

That power requires the approval of the Board of Trustees or the Board of Governors. For some of the fees, a student referendum approval is also required.

The current fee approval process, in place since 1993, uses the fees committee to make recommendations to Chancellor James Moeser on which fees to propose to the trustees.

Farley said this is a "violation of the (Student) Constitution" because Student Congress has no input on its specifically delegated fees.

Daneen Furr, student body treasurer, said during the meeting that she thinks the process works well and should remain as it is.

"While I do want to respect Congress' place in the process, I want to make sure the fees go through the appropriate channels," she said afterward. "Something needs to be established that has longevity."

With just more than a week until Homecoming concert tickets are scheduled to go on sale, organizers have yet to sign a performer.

Plans to host rapper Common for this year's event, scheduled for Oct. 30, fell through, making it harder for Carolina Athletic Association and Carolina Union Activities Board leaders to meet this week's deadline.

Tickets are set to be available Oct. 10.

"We wanted him because he's becoming really popular," said CAA President Justin Johnson. "He could have been available to come and was really excited, but since he's now on tour with Kanye West, they wouldn't let him out."

Common, whose album, "Be," debuted in May, was asking for $40,000, a sum that CAA and CUAB leaders were hesitant to spend on one show.

"Colleges and universities aren't the right places to get concerts," said Jonathon Benson, CUAB president. "If we pay as much for big shows, other programs and activities funded by us on campus wouldn't be possible."

Homecoming is mostly funded by the CAA, with help from CUAB, which automatically receives one-third of student activities fees.

The ballpark price for a homecoming performer ranges from $20,000 to $25,000, Johnson said.

"We could've committed and funded Common by increasing ticket prices but didn't because we don't want to charge students too much," he said.

Benson said that even though other universities may have more money to invest into their homecoming events, he wants to make the show affordable to students and maintain the University's reputation for student involvement.

Benson said he has been scouting for a performer since April but has not been able to match the specific date with the right price.

Although CAA and CUAB were unable to recruit Common, they have a list of alternatives and hope to close the deal with a hip-hop group.

Every year the amount spent has varied per artist. Last year CAA and CUAB spent $5,000 to bring R&B artist John Legend, who was announced on Oct. 6 for an Oct. 24 performance.

Legend was recruited after plans with rock band Sister Hazel fell through. Even though Legend was not first on the list, members of CAA and CUAB said they were pleased with the concert's outcome and felt it appealed to UNC's diverse campus.

Similar to last year's concert, Benson said he wants to have a few student groups perform as opening acts.

Members of CAA and CUAB said even though they believe Common would have provided a great show, their hope to put out a successful show remains strong.

"We are doing our best to put out the best show possible," Benson said. "We are still talking to agents and possible artists but will guarantee satisfaction."
