The not-so-skinny on fashion design

FROM STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

Spain's Health Ministry announced a new program Tuesday in which major fashion designers within the country have agreed to standardize their women's clothing sizes to promote a healthier body image.

The participating designers will have five years to implement the changes, which also prohibit window displays featuring clothes smaller than a U.S. size 8.

"It is not reasonable for a modern and advanced society to establish stereotypes of beauty that are far removed from the social reality of a community," Health Minister Elena Salgado said at a signing ceremony Tuesday.

The program comes about a year after Spain's main fashion show decided to ban certain models from the catwalk because they were too thin.

NOTED. Kevin Bacon might have said he was "horrified" when he first heard of the "Six Degrees" game based on his name, but he now has turned the pop-culture phenomenon into a philanthropic enterprise.

The actor started SixDegrees.org, a social networking site that accepts donations to the favorite charities of participating celebrities. The site has raised $67,000 in less than a week.

QUOTED. "To see his image and the beautiful feelings it has created during my lifetime cheapened by base advertising ... is very disappointing to me."

— Michael Balzary, better known as Flea of the Red Hot Chili Peppers, on the new "Liquid Experience" drinks, which are expected to debut in April from Beverage Concepts, based on Jimmy Hendrix's album "Are You Experienced?"

PRAYER SONG

DTH/COURTNEY POTTER

Brent Wissick, professor of cello at the University, performs "A Prayer for Poland" in Hill Hall Auditorium on Tuesday. The program was inspired by Frederic Chopin's last major work, a cello sonata that celebrates Polish tradition and dance-like movements.
