DAILY DOSE

What if they named her rock 'n' roll?

FROM STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

Metallica may be a cool name for a heavy metal band, but a Swedish couple is struggling to convince officials it is also suitable for a baby girl. Michael and Karolina Tomaro are locked in a court battle with Swedish authorities, who rejected their application to name their six-month-old child after the legendary rock band.

"It suits her," Karolina Tomaro, 27, said Tuesday of the name. "She's decisive, and she knows what she wants."

The Swedish National Tax Board refused to register the name, saying it was associated with both the rock group and the word "metal." Tomaro said the official handling the case also called the name "ugly."

NOTED. A woman is suing her dance partner, claiming he dropped her on her head after flipping her into the air at an office party.

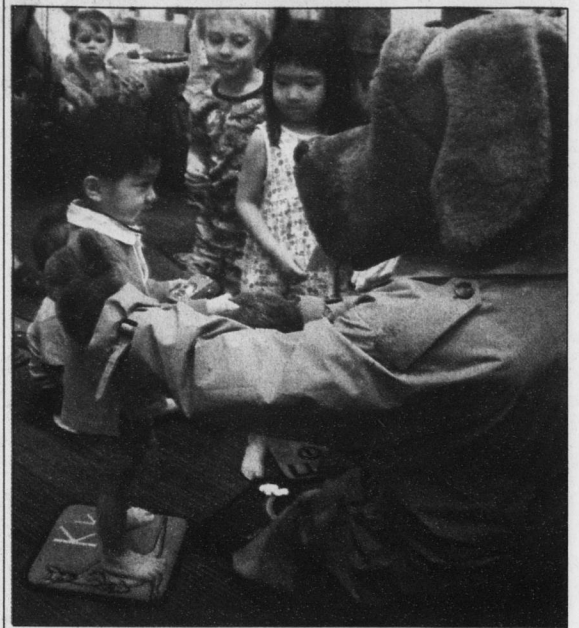

Lacey Hindman, 22, was a victim of "negligent dancing," said her lawyer, David M. Baum. Hindman said that during a party at a Chicago bar and restaurant in April 2006, David Prange grabbed her by the forearms and tossed her in the air, and then she crashed to the wood floor.

QUOTED. "The strangest thing I've tried to do? My father. I snorted my father."

— Keith Richards, the 63-year-old Rolling Stones guitarist, telling British music magazine NME that he mixed his father's ashes with cocaine and then snorted them. His father, Bert, died in 2002, at 84.

Richards advised young musicians against trying to emulate him, saying his survival was luck.

MINI-BITE OUT OF CRIME

DTH/MAGGIE SARTIN

Noah Lee, 3, introduces himself to McGruff the Crime Dog on Tuesday at Kidzu Children's Museum. The "Our Neighbors" event hosted a safety talk by Chapel Hill police officer Mark Geercken and offered a chance to meet the National Crime Prevention Council's famous mascot.
