

New HIV initiative for Hispanics draws praise

BY CAROLINE DYE
STAFF WRITER

A National Latino advocacy group has praised North Carolina's new initiative to combat an AIDS pandemic in the state's Hispanic population.

"We recognize the tremendous step taken by the North Carolina health department," said Guillermo Chacon, vice president of the Latino Commission on AIDS based out of New York, adding that the N.C. measure was a sign of hope.

Douglas K. Griffin, the special projects and minority initiatives coordinator for the HIV/STD prevention and care branch of the Health and Human Services Department, said that Hispanics account for 6 percent of North Carolina's population but that 8 percent of the HIV cases reported in 2006.

Jeffrey Engle, the North Carolina state epidemiologist, said the main purpose of the program was to combat the disproportionate number of Hispanics contracting HIV.

"We have to do better," he said.

He said the initiative is slated to last only one year but that typically these types of programs continue.

Engle said the initiative will take a three-pronged approach. Health officials will work to expand testing, get care to those infected and then encourage continued treatment.

"We have a fantastic opportunity here in North Carolina to prevent what happened in the African American community from happening to the Latino community," Griffin said.

He said that although the number of N.C. Hispanics with HIV/AIDS is growing, this is the time to tackle the problem while it's still manageable.

Douglas and Chacon met in Raleigh Wednesday with Hispanic leaders to discuss the course of HIV prevention in North Carolina.

Griffin said that it was important to avoid one-size-fits-all prevention messages, adding that the very first HIV awareness measures were aimed primarily at the white gay population and were not effective in the black community.

One of the difficulties associated with this initiative is the fact that the Hispanic community is a culturally diverse one, Engle said.

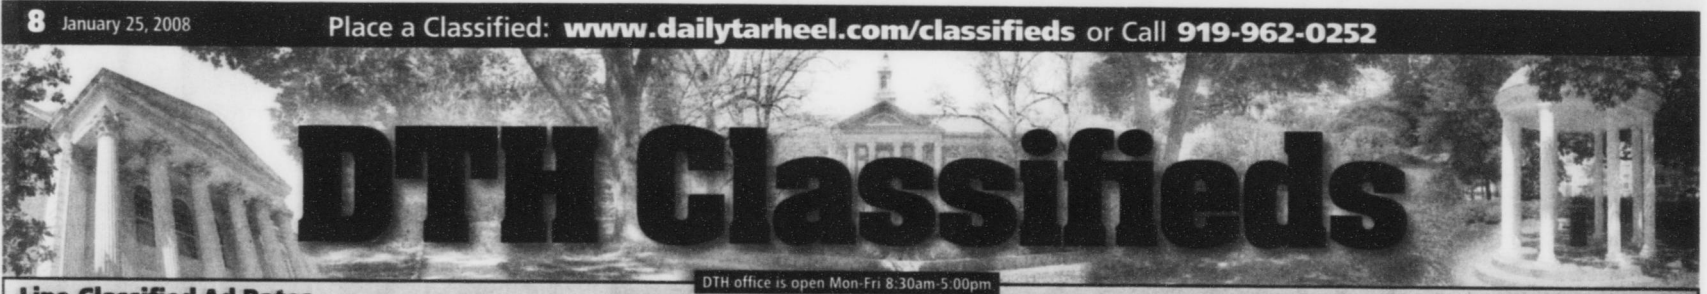

Griffin also emphasized the diversity of North Carolina's rapidly growing Hispanic community. He said the Hispanic population spans from the Middle class to migrant farm workers.

"(Knowledge about HIV) would be directly related to their educational level," he said.

Chacon said that HIV in the Hispanic community has received little attention in the past but that measures like the one being implemented in North Carolina are needed in every state.

A N.C. delegation will attend a national Hispanic leadership summit convened by the Latino Commission on AIDS in Washington, D.C. next week.
