State will only pay for half a boob job

FROM STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

A Raleigh woman who reported her breast implants damaged in an on-the-job car accident should be compensated for the replacement of only one of the implants, state appellate judges ruled this week.

The case was a first for the North Carolina Court of Appeals, which considered for the first time whether damaged breast implants were covered by workers' compensation. The court ruled that implants are covered by workers' compensation because they are a "prosthetic device that functions as part of the body."

In the case of Penny M. Rumble Richardson, only one was deemed worthy of compensation because the damage to the other could have come from a medical error. Only one judge said both needed to be replaced to make the implants "symmetrical."

NOTED. A Florida woman accused of drunk driving reportedly had a case of Busch beer buckled safely in the front seat and a 1-year-old girl in the back seat without a seat belt or car seat.

On Super Bowl Sunday, a deputy saw a car drive through a red light and swerve back and forth over the center lane. The driver, Tina Williams, smelled of alcohol and told the deputy she never had a license.

QUOTED. "Every day these guys drink, drink, drink. I go to practice every day; they drink."

— Ervey Ruiz, 52, a bass and guitar player in a Denver-based mariachi band, who said he was held at gunpoint by the leader of the band when he tried to quit.

Leonardo "Fidel" Berrelleza, 32, was arrested for kidnapping, false imprisonment, menacing and assault.
