

EVANGELIST

Wilkes County, where he had an outstanding warrant for failure to appear on charges of speeding 95 mph in a 65 mph zone, driving with a suspended license and reckless driving to endanger.

He was released from jail on Feb. 20. Four days later, he was arrested for trespassing in the Rams Head parking deck at UNC.

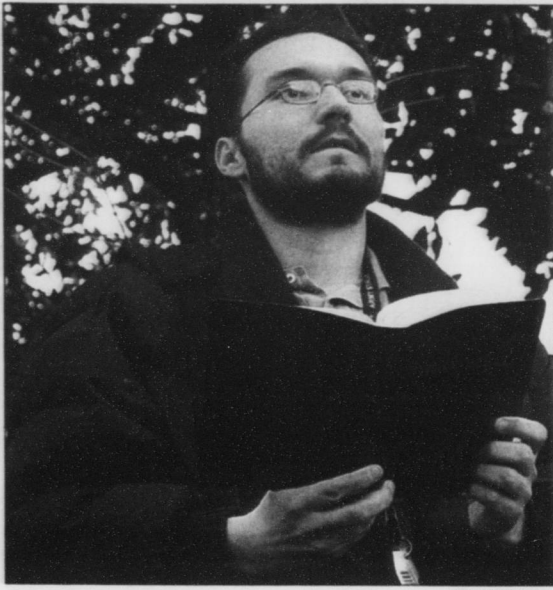

Campus groups have been asked to notify DPS if they see Sweet on campus so they can arrest him.

But Sweet said that the Wilkes County charges stemmed from speeding tickets for which he was not notified of a court date and that the trouble on campus came because of false allegations of harassment.

"I assume it's because I'm vocal, and if they don't want to hear about Christ, it'll make them mad," he said. He added that he might file civil lawsuits against several University community members who he said have created a negative image of him.

Sweet received a bachelor's degree in journalism and religion at Penn State University, then earned a master's degree in divinity in church leadership at Liberty University. He had expected to preach at a church.

But he said he couldn't find peace. So he gave away his possessions, prayed and came to UNC.

DTH/ANKIT GUPTA

Evangelist Timothy Sweet preaches the Gospel on campus last week. He has since been banned from UNC grounds as a result of two trespassings.

His future plans include staying in Chapel Hill for about 10 years, graduating law school, becoming a traveling preacher and running for president of the United States.

But if his March 31 appeal of the campus ban is unsuccessful, and his reception at UNC doesn't improve, he said he'll move along.

"If slander is spreading, do I really want to stay here?"

SCHOOLKIDS

"If you buy an album, it has a whole bunch of songs on it, but this way you can pick and choose which songs you want," UNC junior Tony Calore said.

When asked, a few students said they had never heard of the store.

Other independent music stores are noticing similar trends but don't anticipate closing any time soon.

"Sales are definitely down a bit," said Ryan Richardson, owner of CD Alley on West Franklin Street. "But luckily there are a lot of really hard-core collectors in the area that will keep us afloat."

Cindy Kamoroff, manager of Nice Price Books in Carrboro, said the store is not affected as greatly by Internet sales because it sells used CDs and books, but it does affect the people who shop online.

"I think it has affected the way younger people think about music entirely," Kamoroff said. "They experience individual songs instead of albums or collections."

Schoolkids' other two locations in Raleigh and Athens, Ga., will remain open, Culross said.

He said the Chapel Hill Schoolkids might have had a disadvantage because the town has a smaller population and fewer parking spaces.

Culross also said Schoolkids hopes to move the closing store to a location that "better resembles the environment of the music" it sells.

"We're not going away, whatsoever."
