

UNC trying to train more science teachers

Biology, physics majors gain option

BY MEGHAN E. WOODS
STAFF WRITER

Entering the education field after graduation soon will become easier for biology and physics majors.

In fall 2008 the University plans to launch the UNC Baccalaureate Education in Science and Teaching, or UNC-BEST, a program that will allow students majoring in biology and physics to earn an N.C. teaching license while completing their undergraduate degree.

"We don't have as many teachers qualified to teach sciences at the secondary level," said Steve Matson, chairman of the biology department.

"We want to increase the numbers of science teachers in high schools who have bachelor's degrees in the area they're teaching."

North Carolina's public schools need about 525 science teachers each year, but UNC-system schools produced only about 200 science teachers in the 2006-07 school year — meeting less than half of the state's need.

"Science and math are areas that are always deemed areas of shortage for us," said Stephanie Knott, the spokeswoman for Chapel Hill-Carrboro City Schools.

"A lot of people find science intimidating, and that is often not an area that colleges graduate many certified teachers in."

The demand for science teachers is so high that the district pays a small signing bonus to people who agree to teach the subject, Knott said.

"College students who are gifted in that area often have far more lucrative career opportunities than they would find in education, and that ends up further dissipating the pool," Knott said.

The UNC-BEST program is a collaborative effort between the School of Education and the College of Arts and Sciences. Students interested in the program must apply by May 1.

In addition to the required classes for their major, students also can take three classes within the School of Education.

Interested students can complete the student teaching requirement in the spring of their senior year or after graduation through a postgraduation program at the School of Education, said Laurie McNeil, chairwoman of the Department of Physics and Astronomy.

Before UNC-BEST was created or formulated, all UNC science majors had to pursue another degree after graduation to fulfill the requirements for North Carolina's teaching license.

Deborah Eaker-Rich, interim associate dean of the School of Education, said this additional period of training probably discouraged students from entering the field.

"Many students don't want to do that, for both financial and psychological reasons."

"College students who are gifted in that area often have far more lucrative ... opportunities."

STEPHANIE KNOTT, CHCCS

Although the program is only for biology and physics students, Eaker-Rich said similar programs could be available for other majors in the future.

"We hope to be able to work with other departments," Eaker-Rich said.

"It will grow over time, and we'll provide the courses that are needed to train the teachers."
