Trial ruined by sudoku-playing jury

FROM STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

All of you who won't even read this and instead just skip straight to the sudoku puzzle, you are not alone.

Jurors in a drug conspiracy trial in Australia were caught by the judge solving the popular puzzles while evidence was being entered in the case.

The judge noticed the problem when he saw that the jurors were writing vertically rather than horizontally. Before that, he just thought they were taking notes.

The jury foreman defended his actions, saying, "Some of the evidence is rather drawn out, and I find it difficult to maintain my attention the whole time, and that doesn't distract me too much from proceedings."

Try that one on your professor and see what happens.

NOTED. A Wisconsin man achieved a feat of incredible stupidity June 10 when he was arrested twice for drunken driving within two hours.

The man was originally cited at 1:50 a.m. for driving the wrong way on a one-way street and was released at 3 a.m. to his brother.

Not 40 minutes later, another officer pulled the same man over for driving 20 mph above the posted speed limit. He was again cited for DUI.

QUOTED. "I've been on the job in one form or fashion for 21 years, and this is the first porta-potty rescue I've ever had."

— Lebanon, Pa., Deputy Fire Commissioner Chris Miller, after responding to a 911 call from a man who became stuck in a portable toilet.

Firefighters cut open the portable toilet to find the man naked and drunk. He was charged with public drunkenness.
