Dry university allows debate drinking

FROM STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

Belmont University's campus in Nashville, Tenn., has been dry for more than 50 years. But the small Christian school made an exception for Tuesday's presidential debate between Senators John McCain and Barack Obama.

Among other changes, the private school — which is described as strongly committed to providing a Christian community of learning and service — allowed alcohol to be served at a hospitality tent for the news media.

Universities that competed to host the debates were willing to pay $1.35 million for production expenses and millions more to construct facilities, landscape campus grounds and relocate sports events.

NOTED. Approaching 40 and living alone with your cat is creepy, right?

But Sunday's New York Times style section reported a new trend: Increasing numbers of single, grown men are YouTubeing and Twittering about a new "man's best friend."

Even self-described "straight, geeky guy" Adam Fulrath, 37, said he doesn't care how weird his "primary relationship" with his cat is.

QUOTED. "They treat criminals like that, not 12-year-old innocent children. ... Some were taken down to their bra and panties, and some had to pull their tops out and shake them."

— Martha Feller of Monroe, Mich. Monroe was one of several parents who filed police reports alleging a 7th-grade teacher strip-searched their children after one girl lost $42 at school.
