LIVING LEGENDS

"We typically have about 200 alumni here, but since it's their first time hearing Chancellor Thorp, turnout was a bit heavier," Clark said.

This year, the class of 1958, who celebrated its 50th reunion in the spring, was invited to the event for the first time. The oldest alumni in attendance graduated in 1939.

Despite the name, becoming a member of Living Legends is extremely easy, said Clarence Whitefield, a 1944 UNC graduate and the organization's chairman.

"People tell me I'm not even a living legend," he said. "I say, 'Did you go to Carolina? Has your class had its 50th reunion? Are you still living? Then you're a legend, too.'"

Retired faculty also can become part of the organization.

Whitefield has been involved in alumni affairs since he took a job as alumni director at UNC in 1970. Eleven years ago, Living Legends tapped him as its chairman.

In all of his years in alumni affairs, Whitefield has fielded questions from other schools as to why UNC alumni are so loyal to the University.

And to that question, Whitefield has a simple answer:

"All we do is take them by the Old Well, give 'em a drink of water, and they're hooked for life."

BIDEN

It's about dignity, and it's about respect," he said.

Greensboro residents echoed the belief that Obama could improve their quality of life.

"He's going to make it right for all these people not in schools," said Carlos Benton, a 30-year-old Greensboro resident.

"He'll bring better numbers in this community for the low-income. He might raise us up ... enough to get people on their feet."

Biden's assurances of a restored economy were interspersed with attacks on Republican presidential candidate John McCain.

"You can't call yourself a maverick when all you've been the last eight years is a sidekick," he said.

McCain's negative campaigning is meant to secure a Republican victory by dividing Americans, Biden said.

"The problems are too big and for too long our politics have been too small. Barack Obama knows we need to bring people together."

Biden was optimistic that Obama could withstand any attacks in the last week of the election and secure a victory Nov. 4.

"Folks, I know Barack Obama. I know him well. He has steel in his spine. He can take eight more days of these attacks, but our country can't take eight more years of this."
