Too much unprotected sex for old folks

FROM STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

According to research from University College London, people in their 30s and 40s are less likely than teens to use condoms when having sex with a partner for the first time.

Only 38 percent of men and 29 percent of women aged 35 to 44 said they used protection for their first sexual encounters with a new partner, while 68 percent of 16- to 19-year-olds reported using condoms.

Study participants were asked about the number of sexual partners they'd had and also asked to provide detailed information about the nature of their last three relationships. Overall, 37 percent of men and 29 percent of women said they used a condom the last time they had sex.

NOTED. Addicted to changing your Facebook or Twitter status every five minutes? Having trouble thinking of new ones to use? Then this tool is for you.

Generatus.com generates messages such as: "Jack is wondering: What happens if you get scared half to death twice?" and "Jack can't beat them. So he'll join them, then beat them." Statuses can also be searched by category.

QUOTED. "They laughed the whole time about the joke they played on Brian."

— Utah attorney Steven Shapiro on the case of a high school employee who bought beer for teenage boys in exchange for pictures of their privates.

Turns out Brian Scott Hansen, 49, was the butt of a joke. The pictures were from the Internet, not really from high school boys.
