UNC basketball players help save man

FROM STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

On a plane back from their Maui Invitational, a man in seat 25C was discovered unconscious. Somebody called for help from "big strong basketball players" and Tyler Hansbrough jumped from his seat six rows up to assist.

Hansbrough, Deon Thompson and video coordinator Eric Hoots lifted the 45-year-old man, who had had a seizure, and brought him to paramedics.

"It was a scary situation, but I was proud to see how our guys responded," said basketball coach Roy Williams. "I'm sure there are some people who saw that and thought, 'Those are some really good kids on the North Carolina basketball team.'"

NOTED. There was a steamy sideshow to the game at Minneapolis' Metrodome last weekend.

Two drunk Iowa fans had escaped crowds to have sex in a handicap restroom — and they ended up with their own cheering section, police said.

A security guard tipped off the University of Minnesota police, and officers interrupted the couple to cite them for indecent conduct.

QUOTED. "Just a big pile of small."

— That's what an Illinois zoo maintenance worker calls Reindeer droppings.

The zoo uses the droppings to make "magical reindeer gem ornaments" — dried droppings painted or rolled in glitter, and sold for $5 at the gift shop.

The zoo's two reindeer are named Elau and Rika.

Feminists have shamed men into behaving like brutes instead of honorable gentlemen. Many women seem to find it beneath them to let their husband/boyfriend know that he's their 'knight in shining armor.' (I promise, ladies, your man will stick around if you tell him how great and needed he is, rather than how you're a modern day woman).
