DAILY PROGRESS.

MONDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 8, 1858.

[Written for the "Daily Progress."]
 To  of G.....
 BY GRACE MILLWOOD.

I met thee on life's crowded street,
 And as I passed you smiled,
 Ah! many lonely hours for me
 That smile serene beguiled;
 Oh! could I claim it for my own,
 No more I'd heave a sigh,
 But gently dropping at thy feet,
 Oh! gladly would I die.
 Yes, freely would I shed for thee
 The life blood of my heart,
 And yet I know in this sad world
 We are doomed to live apart;
 For in the depths of thy pure soul
 There is no love for me,
 No kind return, (but friendship's smile)
 For my idolatry.
 But yet 'tis sweet for me to know
 I have thy friendship true,
 'Tis knowledge blessed unto me,
 For I am loved by few;
 And in the world, far, far on high,
 We may together live,
 Then angel of my heart—my soul,
 Farewell,—oh! fare thee well!

BARNUM ON MONEY MAKING.—A very interesting lecture on the shortest and surest way of making a fortune was delivered in the Free-trade Hall, Manchester, on Saturday last, by one of the most famous masters of this rather difficult art, the renowned Phineas T. Barnum. A very large audience, numbering probably upwards of 1,500, assembled, and to hear from his lips the results of his extensive observations, and varied experience touching the important matter on which he had engaged to speak. Like most of the specifications of which Mr. Barnum has had the management, the lecture was of great success. It might have been supposed that a gentleman who is believed to be the cleverest and most successful humbug of the age, would have been a rather unsound teacher and an unsafe guide, and that some of the principles of action which he might recommend would be such as a rigid moralist could not altogether approve. In this respect only it is probable that the lecture disappointed the expectations of many of its hearers. It was unexceptionable in point of morality as it was amusing in point of style, and received, as it well deserved, the hearty approbation and applause of the audience. Mr. Barnum took it for granted that every man whom he addressed would rather be rich than poor, [hear, hear,] he need not, therefore, waste many words in glorifying money, or proving that in itself it was a good thing. Nor need he say much in refutation of the vulgar fable that the money-getter was necessarily sordid and mean; or that goodness was necessarily thriftless and imprudent. On the contrary, money-getting (which was commerce) was one of the most useful, and, consequently, one of the most honorable of all occupations—the parent of civilization, and of innumerable blessings to mankind. The greatest and wisest of men in all ages, from Abraham, the first merchant on record, down to the present day, were almost invariably distinguished for their knowledge and their skillful practice of the art of making and of keeping money. As a striking instance of this fact, he referred to Shakespeare, whom he described as being, par excellence, a clever and thrifty showman, whose highest aim was to hit the popular taste, to write such plays as would draw the best houses, and so to put money in his purse—a description of the immortal bard which seemed to take the audience somewhat by surprise, and to find but little favor in their sight. Besides Shakespeare, Chaucer, and Scott, on this side of the Atlantic, and Prescott, Bancroft and Irving on the other, were examples of men eminent at once in literature and in this most useful of arts. Marlborough and Wellington were almost as remarkable for their thrift and economy as for their military genius, and had Washington not been the greatest of patriot soldiers, he might have ranked high as a merchant or a millionaire. As there were three ways in which men might become great, so there were three ways in which they might become wealthy. Some men were born rich; some achieved riches; some had riches thrust upon them. He had only to speak of the way in which men might achieve riches, and he at once admitted that he had absolutely nothing to say on that point which was new. He could only repeat and urge once more the old and well known rules of prudence and economy, illustrating those ancient saws wherever he could by modern instances. The lecturer proceeded in a very forcible manner to state and enforce those rules for making money which he considered most important, interspersing them with numerous amusing anecdotes, which were exceedingly well told and well received. The rules were such as the following: Be honest; be prompt in making engagements, and exact in fulfilling them; persevere; advertise; tell no more about your business than is necessary; never pass a week-day without reading a good newspaper (a maxim which we beg heartily to enforce), and others equally true and equally sensible. Of the humor of the lecture it is impossible for us to give anything like a satisfactory specimen. Mr. Barnum concluded his remarks by a very ingenious and amusing defence of humbug, which he defined to be the art of dressing up an object so as to render it attractive; of putting on glittering appearances for the sake of arresting attention. This was only deserving of blame when the article put forward was not what it professed to be. When the object offered for sale or for show was intrinsically good, it was allowable, he contended, to draw attention to it by every legitimate means; and on this principle he vindicated his own conduct, and maintained that he acted toward the public in an honorable and straightforward manner. Mr. Barnum concluded his address amid loud applause, and, on retiring, was called back to receive the hearty approbation—a compliment which he acknowledged in a humorous and appropriate speech.—Manchester Examiner, Oct. 11.

ASTOUNDING.—It is admitted that the Atlantic Telegraph Cable has parted!
