the present time. There existed what amounted to a state of war, and a drastic measure was necessary, but, he said, peace prevails in Panama and there was no reason for creating such a despotism as would obtain by giving the president unlimited authority over everything in the canal strip. Furtherr ore, Mr. Harrison said, it was unwise, just preceding a presidential election, to place at the disposal of the president seven or eight hundred lucrative positions in Panama.

Mr. Hepburn of Iowa said the measure was only a tentative one and it was not intended that the president should have permanent, absolute jurisdiction over the canal strip, but that there would be suitable legislation when it became necessary. At present no one knew just what would be the boundary of the canal strip. The bill was passed without division, It was the intention of the House leadget it back to the Senate in order that the conference committee may have ample time to adjust the differences behe government of the canal zone.
