An Officer of the Treasury Department Decides that the Constitution Does Not Follow the Flag-He Defines the Status of the Insular Courts Under the Act of Congress Providing for the Government of the Island.

Washington, Oct. 3 .- Comptroller Tracewell, of the Treasury Department, has just issued an important opinion on the character of the United States courts. in Porto Rico. He holds incidentally, that the Constitution of the United States did not extend to Porto through the operation of the treaty with Spain, and he declares that the United States have become the owners of the island, although neither the island nor the people, by the act of cession, became an integral part of the United States. The decision relates directly to the courts

"The insular government for Ports Rico has made up a budget purporting to provide funds for all the necessary Fifth race, 1 mile-Templar, 7 to 5; operating expenses of the United States to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico imposes upon such government the duty of providing support for the operating expenses of said ponding right to require its officers to report to and account for all their receipts and expenditures to such island government.

"The determination of the questions involved requires the consideration of the status of the District Court of Porto Rico. Is it a local court of Porto Rico, or a United States court located in Porto Rico?

"Porto Rico was acquired as the result of the settlement of our late war with the kingdom of Spain and it was acquired by the United States by virtue of the provisions of the treaty of peace between this government and the kingdom of Spain. It is quite evident from a reading of the entire treaty that there was no intent on the part of the treatymaking powers to extend by that instrument either the Constitution of the United States or its statute laws over his ceded territory. "It (the treaty) became the supreme law of such acquired territory. With

had authority to enact for the government of this acquired territory all such laws as it deemed suitable and necessary to the capacities and wants of its people. The United States, by the act of cession, became the owner of the island, but such island nor its people did not by the mere act of cession become an integral part of the United States. "The act providing for a civil government for Porto Rico extends the statute laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, except as in the act otherwise provided, over the island of Porto Rico. The statute laws of the United States relative to the district courts of the United States are not, so far as am advised, inapplicable to a United

"The question left for determination, is, are the ordinary operating expenses of this court included in the expenses of the officers of judge, marshal or clerk, or their assistants or deputies? The judge is one of the officers of this court; as likewise are the clerk and marshals; and the law provides that the expenses R. H. E. of their offices shall be borne by the is not an office. It is not the judge, the clerk, or the marshal. It is the aggregate of all these officers and their help and assistants. It is an organized b, dy composed of all those offices and their officers.

"It is reasonably certain that under the terms of the Porto Rican act but one class of deputy United States marshals is provided to be appointed by this court, namely, a class of deputies to be paid a salary out of the treasury of Porto Rico.

"I am of the opinion and decide that all operating expenses of this court should be paid by the United States; that the fines, costs and fees charged and collected by the marshal should be paid into the treasury of the United States; that the marshal should report to the accounting officers of the United States as required by law, and account to the accounting ocers of the United States for all his receipts and expenditures relative to the operating expenses of this court; that the deputy marshals shall be paid their compensation from the treasury of Porto Rico, and that the Department of Justice is required to furnish Marshal Wilson with all necessary blanks for his office.'
