The National Council of Switzer land has adopted two important measures of compulsory insurance for all persons not having indepen dent means of existence, one compelling them to take out accident in surance, and another requiring them to insure against sickness. The idea of making people provident by compulsion may be a good thing in far as it shall prove to be a social and economic success to that extent it will tood to weaken or destroy the sweet influences of fraternity and parity which spring from purely duntary associations. The Swiss preciative public. plan will interest the student of sociology; as a venture in State Social ism it will not commend itself to a democracy like ours.
