smiths, painters, and almost every trade and profession. i raternal societies today constitute a mighty influence in preventing pauperism, says the Rainbow. They have solved the difficult problem of giving aid without giving charity. They have provided a way by which the man in want can receive help without losing his respect and sinking into the humble place of a pauper. The state owes a debt of gratitude for their work in this respect and every community where one exists is under obligations to it for the distress it has relieved through its operations, and which but for it would have added to the public burdens.

The Golden Rod makes the following sensible remarks which we most cordially endorse: "Have you done your duty toward your lodge? Have you been as careful in performing your duty as you expect your lodge to be in performing its duty toward your loved ones when you have passed to your final account? Seriously ask yourself this question and et your conscience answer. If you have been careless, indifferent and negligent ask yourself what would become of your lodge, your jurisdiction and the order if all other mempers should show like indifference.

There is a sacred precinct in all raternities into which the eye of the world may not look. The curse of all the world, and the destruction of all happiness and barmony is the parading of family quarrels in pubic. No story of a difference between brothers and sisters, fathers and children was ever correctly told. The plain, unvarnished truth never appears. As the family circle should be sacredly protected from the curious gaze of those who would destroy it by innuendo and slander, so the Lodge should keep within its own secret and sacred home, the troubles that may arise, and he forgets his frateruity and his duty to his fellows who parades it before the eyes of the unthinking multitude.
