The craze of some Americans for imaginary estates in England has again called from the American minister in London an emphatic warning against spending money in trying to win them. Apart from the fact that the statute of limitations would prevent any chance of gaining suits entered for mythical property, it may be said that according to returns issued by order of the Court of Chancery, there are no estates lying idle in England amounting to such fabulous sums as people think. Nor is there any large amount of money in the bank of England awaiting claimants, the highest single claim reported being about one thousand pounds. The chase after these alleged estates, such as the Jennings, Townley, Hyde, Bradford and others, is stimulated by legal sharks who fancy small fish are easily caught by gilded bait.
