A FAIRY TALE.

In the midst of the great fair at King Cathemar's court sat an old man with a booth. The counter was marble, white and cold as snow; the awning were of blue silk with broad silver stripes, and the old man himself was the oddest sight ever seen, with a white beard that reached his feet and a long black robe embroidered with gold. Royal oranges were piled up on his counter, purple grapes, clear, sweet white ones; bunches of scarlet cherries, red apples, downy peaches, luscious pears; ripe, rich strawberries, thimble shaped blackberries; in short, every kind of fruit in the world was there.

Everybody stopped and bought, from the king himself to the little pink pages, till left, but these were the largest and finest ever seen. Then the old man began to cry out, "Who'll buy? These are fairy apples out of Queen Lilla's orchard, and whoever gets them will get wisdom with them, but neither gold, silver nor diamonds can buy them!"

The crowd grew still greater, for everybody said to everybody else, "Come and see three apples that all the diamonds in King Cathemar's court can't buy." And every one talked and wondered till at last some one thought to ask what would buy the apples.

"Little enough," said the old man. "Whoever will go to the fountain in the middle of yonder forest and say, 'Token broken' 20 times will have the apples and wisdom with them."

"What stuff!" said somebody. "Don't say it, then," answered the old man. "Fairy apples needn't go a begging." But the crowd hung back and looked at each other, for there were odd stories about the old forest on the left of the city, and people were not fond of walking in it.

At last stepped out Lord Martinus, nephew to the king, and cried:

"It will go for the fairy apples, and if I win them I will give them to the princess." And mounting his horse, he rode gaily away to the forest, but on the very entrance his horse stumbled and broke his neck, and as it is an ill omen to go back Lord Martinus went forward on foot.

Before long he met a lovely child. "Where are you going, my pretty one?" asked the Lord Martinus.

"To pick fairy apples that grow so thick in an orchard close by that the branches break under them," answered the babe.

"I will go with you," said Lord Martinus. So the child led the way and the young lord followed till he was faint and weary.

"Do you call this close by pretty one?" said he at last.

"There they are," said the child, pointing to trees full of golden pippins, 30 times larger and finer than those at the fair, but hardly had Lord Martinus raised his hand to pick one when all the boughs began to whip him, and though he was the fastest runner in all King Cathemar's kingdom, a sorry wight was the gay Lord Martinus before he got out of the orchard, with his velvet robe torn to pieces and his eyes almost scratched out of his head.

"Still he went on till he met a young girl. "Where are you going, fair one?" cried he again.

"To court," said the girl, to give this skein of silver thread to the princess, if I can only find some one who will hold it while I wind it in a ball."

"I will hold it," said Lord Martinus, seeing that it was but a little skein, but the longer she wound the larger it grew, till at length it was dark. Then Lord Martinus found that he could not stir, for she had woven all the thread in a net and the net was around him. There he lay till morning, when he looked about himself he was in the midst of the fair in front of the old man's booth and everyone were laughing at him.

Then Lord Schurz spoke up. "I will go for the apples," said he, and rode gaily away, but the next morning there was he in a silver net in the midst of the fair. And it was Lord Martinus' turn to laugh.

Out stepped little Carl, one of the pages.

"I will go," cried he, and though everybody tried to hold him back went off as lightly as the two lords had done.

Before long he met a child, who said to him:

"Come and pick my fairy apples."

But Carl only answered, "I want no stolen fruit," and trudged on.

Then he met a maiden.

"Help me to wind this skein," said she. But Carl replied:

"I have no time, fair damsel," and went on.

Presently he heard water gurgling and saw the fountain falling like diamonds in the cool sunlight.

Standing on the bank he commenced to say:

"Token broken" 20 times, but at the first sound all the trees were filled tin goblets that clashed and clattered against one another and cried out, "Take me and drink," "Do take me and drink," "Do take me and drink," till Carl could not hear his voice as he said over the magic words. At the twentieth time, however, fell a dead silence over all the forest, and you might have heard a pin drop in it or the flowers growing while he made his way back to the fair and claimed the pippins.

"Take and eat them," said the old man, "and wisdom will come to you." So Carl went home and ate the apples, and in the morning every one began to crowd around him and ask: "Has wisdom come to you?" "How do you feel?" Are you any different?" But Carl went straight to the old man's booth without uttering a word.

Then he said: "Those apples tasted like any other pippins."

"Well," answered the old man.

"And I don't think they were worth Lord Martinus' coat, Lord Schurz's scratched face and my day's wages."

"Precisely," said the old man. "Wisdom has come to you. If I had told you they were Farmer Merlin's pippins you would all have laughed at me, but because I called them fairy apples you were ready to break your neck to get them—as if fairy pippins were better than any other pippins. Wisdom has come to you indeed, if you learn from this not to judge in appearances or trust in a name."

The world is full of fairy pippins, but believe me, I have been through that forest myself and the dear old home pippins taste quite as well and will cost you neither a scratched face nor a sorrowful heart.—Exchange.

RAILROAD TAX CASES.

Columbia (S. C) Register. Clerk J E Hagood, of the United States court, who was appointed special master to hear the reference in the railroad tax cases, resumed the taking of testimony in this city. The session is being held in one of the offices in the postoffice building Mr C T Williams was sworn in as official stenographer.

The railroads are endeavoring to prove that private lands are not being returned at the proper value, while the railroads are required to pay their value and more.

The court before which Arton, the French lobbyist who was arraigned for bribing members of the Chamber of Deputies, laid it on to him pretty heavy, sentencing him to twenty years imprisonment, to disfranchisement and to pay a fine of $80,000. Although he was charged with bribery, they didn't succeed in finding any one he bribed.

Fetter's Southern Magazine (Fetter & Bush Publishing Company, Louisville, Kentucky) for June contains among other good things an essay on Father Ryan in his poems, from the pen of Calvin S. Brown, of Vanderbilt University. This essay, on account of the masterly way in which Mr Brown handles his subject, is bound to attract widespread attention.
