RALEIGH, MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1894.

NO. 75

Mr. Richard Mansfield Coming-

Mr Richard Mapsfield and his admirable company will appear at the Academy of Music on Saturday even ing, in that rare picture of old English manners. "Beau Brummell" No other successful actor is as persistent as Mr Mansfield in allowing himself the widest range of character and the fullest display of a versatility which fullest display of a versatility which really amounts to genius. For some years people have been calling Mr Mansfield a genius, and his marvelous portrayal of the great Beau would alone seem to justify that term. The comedy of "Beau Brummell" is a living representation of the "anners and dress of the Georgian period, with Beau Brummell, the gentleman of his time, polished, coldly courteous critical, egotistical faultless in attire and cal, egotistical faultless in attire and witty in speech, as the central figure. Mr Manefield has created this artificial stage here with nothing whatever to guide him beyond a few fragments of history. In his hands the famous beau is shown as the perfumed ex-quisite of magnificent repose and un-ruffled grandeur, debt riddeu but dica tatorial, setting the fashion and snubbing the Prince of Wales In the last two scenes the dramatic inte est is in tensified with the Beau banished to the continent, poverty stricken and even starving, continues to live upon the "usmes of things," and to maintain his haughty pride and fault less personal bearing He is a gentle, man in rags as he was in sliks In the delirium scene Mr Mansfield is wonderfully pathetic.

The special stage settings and his-torically correct costumes will be em-ployed in the local presentation— There should be no delay in the ap plication for seats on account of the great demand.
