

VOL. II. TUESDAY, JUNE 23, 1801. No. 88.

Ours are the Plans of fair delightful Peace, Unwar'd by Party Rage to live like Brothers.

English Account of EGYPTIAN AFFAIRS.

By a vessel arrived at Bolton in 35 days from Gibraltar. Gibraltar, April 17, 1801. Yesterday arrived from Aboukir, in 28 days, his Majesty's shired armed brig Louisa, Trufcote, from whom we have the following information. The British army under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, arrived in Aboukir Bay on the 2d of March, but did not attempt to disembark, on account of tempestuous weather until the 8th, when a landing was effected by 7000 men, under a heavy fire from artillery and small arms. The French made a vigorous opposition, advancing to the beach and actually leveling muskets over the gunwales of the boats; but the British soldiers, leaping on shore, attacked the enemy with the bayonet, made good their debarkation and drove the French about two miles towards Alexandria, and into the castle of Aboukir; taking from their 8 pieces of cannon.

Our loss in killed and wounded this day is computed to amount to 400 or 500 men; and the enemy's about the same. Among the corps which made this first landing were the guards, 28th, 42d, 90th, and 92d regiments. Our troops were reinforced the same evening by 5000 more men who landed afterwards; and having established themselves in this position, they remained until the 13th of March, when a general action took place, which terminated in the total route of the French, and four pieces of cannon being captured by the English, who lost about 1000 men in this affair; but by accounts from prisoners, the loss of the French was greater.

On the 14th, the attack commenced upon the castle of Aboukir, and on the 18th, that garrison surrendered to the British forces, all the guns, except two, having been dismounted by the fire from our batteries.

When the Louisa left Egypt, the British army was poised within two miles of Alexandria; and the French, supposed to be about 6000 strong, were entrenched on the heights at Pompey's Pillar, and commanded Alexandria. The British were occupied in disembarking their field-train of battering cannon, two thirds of which were already on shore; an attack upon the French camp was expected very soon to begin; when it was supposed there could be little doubt of the event being as ominous to Britain as the preceding actions had proved. The French and at first mistaken the 42d regiment in the Highland dress, for Turks, and attacked them with their usual confidence; but were received with a gallantry and spirit, which they did not expect, and probably had not been accustomed to. The Highlanders received the French cavalry on their bayonets; in their turn made a brisk charge; checked, and completely worsted that part of the French army opposed to them.

It is further reported that Murad Bey and his followers have attacked the French at Cairo, and prevented Menou from joining his forces at Alexandria, where all the rest of the French troops had been concentrated. Certain accounts had arrived that the Grand Vizier with his army had marched towards Delta about the 20th of February. One of the Lieutenants of his Majesty's ship Swiftsure, writes as follows to his friends in Gibraltar, dated 15th March: "Our gallant army is only waiting for the heavy artillery to attack the enemy's height near Alexandria, which must immediately fall on our becoming masters of this height, as it entirely commands the town."

Sir John Warren fell in with and chased the squadron under Admiral Gantheleme, on the 21st of March, but lost sight of them in the night. They were seen on the 4th of April, by his Majesty's brig of war the Mutine, off the island of Sardinia, steering North-east. Two of the line of battle ships had lost their foremasts.
