100000 From the Literary Magazine: THE EVE OF BATTLE.

All was so still, so soft in earth and air. You scarce would start to meet a spirit there.

There is no situation, perhaps, in which man is more susceptible of the kinder feelings of his nature, than when he is about to risk his existence in the pride of mortal conflict. The ties of love, of friendship, and of kindred, seem in that hour, to be woven more closely cound the heart, and dear er than they ever were before; and the probability, that will intrude itself into the mind, of our soon being insensible to them all, gives life a thousand charms.

Agitated by such feelings as these on the night before a de perate engagement; and unable to take the repose which was to fit me for encountering the fatigues and dangers of the approaching combat, I strolled some distance from my tent hoping the freshness of the night air might insome degree calm the feverish ferment of my spirit. It was a delicious night in the earlier part of June : and the full moon shone with (as I thought at the time) unparaleled splendor .-The camp of our army was situated along a height which gently slided down to a small river, scarcely a musket shot in breadth, on the opposite side of which, on a corresponding range of hills, was formed that of the enemy. All was silent as the grave, except when now and then, the shrift neigh of an impatient war-horse would for a moment break the stillness of the scene, and then die away in the distance; whilst round the watchfires that faintly studded either camp, and which gleamed with ghastly lustre in the pale moonlight, might faintly be defined the figu es of men, who as they passed to and fro, seemed like demons celebrating their orgies in anticipation of the scene of carnage and blood about to ensue ..

As I gazed on the vast assemblage of tents, whose tops glistened in the beams of the moon, I thought of their sleeping inmates; of the many, who, now in the arms of " nature's balmy comforter," were forgetting their past cares and approaching danger; and who, ere the sitting of the morrow's sun, would sink into that sleep from which the last trump only would rouse them. They were then, probably, transported in their counts to the midst of their families, where they were enjoyin vall, that paternal kindness or tender affection could bestow; endearments which alas! they were fated never to enjoy again in reality : from them I naturally reverted to my own situation; I thought of my home; my aged parents, of my brothers, and sisters, of her who might then be gazing at the levely planet shining with a silvery radiance in its empyreal course, and breathing a prayer to hea ven for my safety. I thought of them. all I held dear on earth, till I was al most overpowered by the intensity of my feelings, when, as if to complete the enthusiastic sadness of the moment, a strain of music caught my ear, as floating in the night breeze, it illied softly away-I listened, and again it was reneated, and I could plainly distinguish in the clear tones and soothing melody of the flute, the well know and pathetic air of The Wounded Hussar. It came from the opposite camp, and probably, served to beguile away the reflections of some lonedy wanderer like myself.

I have listened to music in all i's forms-I have heard the proud notes of triumph in the hour of victory, the sweetest music to a soldier's ear ;have yielded to the momentary exhilaration produced by the ball room orchestra; have experienced the fascinating entrancement attendant on the witcheries of song, when warbled from the lips of female loveliness; yet there was a something in that simple melody breathed in such an hour, and in such a situation, which surpassed them all, it was so much in union with the scene, and my feelings at the time, that the enchantment it then possessed, has continued till the present moment, and will to the last hour of my existence.
