The Boll Weevil Problem
 around stumps in the field and it would not be a bad idea to burn out the stumps and old rotten logs in the woods near the fields.

Topping Cotton Error
SOME farmers each year take up the old fallacy of topping the cotton and plowing deeply along side of each row to destroy the roots. The idea is to hasten maturity when the boll weevil appears in force. It will hasten maturity without doubt, but it also cuts the yield and harms the quality of the crop. Rather than that, it would be better for a farmer to let the weeds and grass have free course. He will make as much cotton as by the topping, root-destroying method, and make it cheaper. But, of course, the way to grow cotton is to fight the boll weevil.

Fallacy Regarding Cotton Seed
IN SOME sections it has been found that farmers are ordering their cotton seed for planting from territory not yet invaded by the boll weevil. Their idea apparently is that the boll weevil is like the grain weevil which gets into the seed.

Absurd, of course. Seed bought in non-boll weevil territory are not freer from boll weevil attacks than seed obtained in boll weevil regions. No weevil is within a seed. The weevil lays no eggs in the seed to hatch out later on. Eggs are laid only in squares and bolls and if any of them fail to hatch out in the summer be assured they will never hatch out.

Poison Gases Useless
ATTEMPTS have been made over and over to poison the boll weevil with gases, even with the strongest known gases, but with no success. Yet we still have the gas man with us who believes he has a "sure death dealer" to weevils.

Weevils breathe through pores in their crusty covering. They have no mucus membrane like men and animals which poison can attack with paralyzing effect. The weevil lives on even when gases are strong enough to kill the cotton plant and strong enough to kill man and beast, if they were unprotected by gas masks.

Where All Methods Are Tried
AT Tallulah, Louisiana, the United States Department of Agriculture has maintained a laboratory and experiment station to try out and devise methods of fighting the boll weevil. Every known device has been given a fair test. Out of it all there has emerged one outstanding successful and economical method of boll weevil control, the calcium arsenate poison method.

The boll weevil experts still recommend the well-known methods of promoting the early fruiting of the cotton so as to "beat the boll weevil to it" as far as possible and then to put up a fight for the rest of a full crop by making applications of poison.

The way to "beat the boll weevil to it" and the way to poison the weevil are not within the scope of our subject "Mistakes in Fighting the Boll Weevil," but are entitled to treatment as separate stories.

PICKIN'S Do It Now
 The old member who had failed to pay up was a little indignant at the letter he received.
 "I think," he said, "that your dun was a little overdone."
 "Well," replied the recorder, "your dues were a little overdue."

The Bishop's Dilemma
 An absent-minded bishop could not produce his ticket for the railway collector.
 "Never mind, my lord," said the conductor; "It's all right anyway, whether you find it or not."
 "Oh no, it isn't!" said the bishop, turning out his pockets. "I must find that ticket. I want to know where I'm going."—Successful Farming.
