The Star says, in order to keep a boy on the farm, give the boy a chance. That is the only way a boy can be kept in a store. Every boy is a quitter when he hasn't got a chance.

Since it has been demonstrated that most any crop can be raised profitably in North Carolina farmers no longer are justified in raising nothing but cotton or tobacco in order to get cash, says Wil. Star.

Work is being rushed at State Department of Education in Raleigh in preparation of the pamphlet for use in the public schools on North Carolina Day, which this year will be Friday, December 19, the last school day before Christmas.

That Ex-Governor R. B. Glenn has not fully decided that he will not run for the Senate against Senator Overman became certain when it was learned that the former governor is sending throughout the State letters to prominent Democratic leaders, "sounding them", indeed if not actually asking them to support him in the coming senatorial race.

A movement is now on foot to inaugurate a "definite and specific campaign" for the betterment of rural life by selecting some typical rural communities within the State and there introduce "thorough co-operative systems that will pervade the entire life of the community in all its civic as well as educational relations."

Royster Best of the Three.
The report is going the rounds that Major Stedman, Congressman from this district, is spending right much time now in the district looking after his fence. He might spend all the time from now until the election in the district and he could not repair the rents he has made. They are beyond repair and the Major will find it so when the time comes. There are two or three mighty good men in the district who have an eye on the Majors seat in Congress, and men who will represent the district and not themselves as is the case at present. Creedmoor Times-News.

Of the three Gen. Royster is the best, and would represent the people in Congress and not himself.

Senator F. M. Simmons.

Samuel G. Blythe, in Saturday Evening Post has this to say of Senator Simmons:
Mr. Simmons' place in the political almanac is now secure as follows: Co-author of the tariff law of 1913. He stands beside Walker, and Mills, and Wilson, and McKinley, and Dingley, and Payne, and Aldrich—in that glorious galaxy of statesmen who trifled with the tariff at the behest of the people and who were in turn trifled with by the same people who behested.

He is a sturdy man, short in stature and stockily built. His mental processes are matter-of-fact. He revels in details, insists on accuracy, and learned what he knows about the tariff by digging continuously into that dusty subject. He re-wrote one of his speeches thirteen times before it suited him. He is serious, self-centered, courageous and quiet. He demands his fair share and gets what is coming to him, but does not posing and no blustering. He talks little, listens well, knows a hawk from a handsaw and the rate of duty on each.

He is 59 years old and served two years in the House of Representatives back in the eighties. After that he was collector of internal revenue for North Carolina for four years, and 1892 until 1906 was the Chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee of the State. He was elected to the Senate in 1901 to succeed Marion Butler and just beginning his third term.

He always wears a wool hat, takes an occasional chew of tobacco, is given to long walks alone for the purpose of meditation, and belongs to the Episcopal Church. Likewise as I may have stated, he is Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, which teaches us that the way to grab the good things in Congress is simple. The rule is this: Get in and stay in, and in the fullness of time all will be yours.

Mt. Zion Baracas

On Saturday evening the Baracas gave the Philatheas of their church an oyster supper at the home of Mrs. Nat Baird's. Quite a crowd came out to enjoy the feast in spite of the cold and threatening weather. The kitchen was a most interesting scene with the boys arrayed in appropriate dress-aprons assisting the two married ladies prepare the meal.

When the guests were invited to the dining room, a most delightful scene awaited them. This room was beautifully decorated with ferns and potted flowers. The table with its snowy linen, handsome china, silver and cut glass, presented a most beautiful picture.

Oysters served in almost any style you desired, together with pickles, crackers, bread and dressings were most bountiful and though there were several tables to be served, the generous supply of eatables prepared by these thoughtful young men, were scarcely disturbed.

Therefore on Sunday night the supper was repeated at the home of Mrs. Elmore Gooch.

Both of these events were much enjoyed and greatly appreciated by those who attended.
