and let him go his own way, let no vicious or designing white man put false notions in his head and he will give no trouble along the lines of social equality. All he wants is to be let alone and allowed to pursue his own course and live out his own life in his own way. He is doclle, tractable, good humored, good natured and easily controlled. This was his character as a slave. This would be his character now as a free man, were he let alone. He has respect and in many cases veneration and love for his old master and for the latter's descendants. This is undoubtedly true of the ex-slaves, and where it has undergone change in the succeeding generation it is because of the changed nature of his educational and social conditions wrought by the white people. But, to the regret of all men of both races who desire to see continued the true friendship of the two races who are destined to live together for no one knows how many generations to come, the old conditions are changing. New conditions of government | case and of citizenship are springing up among us, not of the making of the masses of either race. But they are put upon us and we have to face

This question of social equality concerns us of the South, both white people and negroes, more than the citizens of any other section of the union for obvious reasons and, therefore, it behooves us to be strenuous in our endeavors to keep well defined the line dividing the two races.
