The Farm Exodus. One of our biggest farm problems as is being plainly revealed by the early returns of the 1920 census, is how to prevent the continued exodus of population from the country to the city. While the census figures for the past 50 years have shown a continual drift of population city-ward, the 1920 figures reveal a condition that is somewhat alarming. Cities throughout the corn belt have increased in population as much as 100 per cent during the past 10 years. Small cities as well as the large ones show a surprising growth. Manufacturing and large business centers show the largest increase. From whence comes this population? From two places mainly, the small villages and the farms. People from villages have moved in large numbers to the cities because of better wages and better living conditions. This movement has directly affected the farmer. Farmers in most communities have depended to a considerable extent in the past on labor from the community center especially in hay harvest, threshing and corn cutting. Today this source of labor is very near extinct and the farmer is the loser. It is reasonable to expect a gradual replacement of farm labor by machinery but when the condition gets to a place where it becomes impossible for the farmer to get a man to operate a tractor which will do the work of two or three men with teams it is extremely discouraging. This very condition exists today. Farmers who have purchased complete equipment for saving labor to make it possible for one man to accomplish as much as three or four men, find it next to impossible to find the one man. As a result the machinery stands idle and land goes uncultivated. This condition will not improve greatly until the farmer receives a sufficient return for his produce to make it possible for him to compete with other industries in the payment of wages.—Indiana Farmer's Guide.
