THE NOVELETTE.

JIM'S LIABILITY
(By William R. Cowles)

"Well—doctor, let me know the worst." Jim Hendricks tried to speak jokingly, but there was something about the coldly professional atmosphere of the physician's office which precluded jocularity. And besides, the worst might be so very bad!

As a matter of fact, it wasn't. "You're suffering from—well, not exactly shell-shock, but something similar. Quit dealing with words and figures. You say you're an accountant? Well, get hold of a job where you handle tangible, material things—and let somebody else keep the books. Farming, for instance. A few years spent thus will doubtless put your nervous system back on the rails again."

Jim left, deeply despondent. All the long apprenticeship gone for naught. Farming—bah! He had never fancied the country. He wondered about Shirley, his "letter-girl"—what would she think of being a farmer's wife?

Ultimately, Jim staked his all on a little grocery store on the outskirts of the city—and almost lost out. The opportunity had been rather thrust upon him by the death of the owner, a friend of Jim's father, and the subsequent bewilderment of the widow, who wanted to go back to Canada to her own people. The first thing Jim knew he had purchased the store, lock, barrel and good will: had put Mrs. Kirkham and three children on the train for Montreal, and had promised to keep an eye on Molly Kirkham, who was staying on to finish a course in business college.

If Jim's winter stretched ahead of him far differently than he had planned, it yet promised no idle moments. What with caring for the old trade and trying to build up new, penning long letters to Shirley, in which he had not yet summoned up sufficient courage to tell her of his change in occupation, and keeping an eye upon Molly—as agreed upon. Jim hardly found time to lament for his lost job.

Molly developed a not unpleasant habit of dropping in evenings and helping him make up his books—the sort of work he had been told to avoid—and at times Jim began to think how very pleasant it would be if only his letter girl would break her rule that he was not to hunt her out for a while, so that he might have her companionship as well as the cheerful camaraderie of correspondence.

"I say, Jimmy," began Molly one evening breaking in upon this sort of meditation, "what's the idea of putting the soda fountain way down back?"

"I don't know," said Jim. "What would you say my idea was?"

"Trying to hide it!" She nodded her head wisely. "Now, you know, away out here a soda fountain in a grocery store ought to be a paying line. Move it out front. Let it tickle people's imaginations on the way in, and they'll be too weak to resist it on the way out." She slipped down from her perch and helped herself to a salted peanut from the jar.

"Molly," Jim waylaid her, took her by the shoulders and gave her a little shake. "When I left for France you were nothing but a kid—and now—why—" He broke off vaguely. He must hold himself in hand. He had decided long ago that he was going to marry Shirley. Well, that means nix on other girls and hands off!

"Yep," said Molly, cheerfully. "I was only a kid and never would you give me that much notice!" She indicated an infinitesimal amount of air space between her thumb and forefinger. Then, "By the way," she said at the very doorway, "if you want to be prosperous, look prosperous! Get a telephone and put it right up in front of the store. And Saturday I'll come around and wash your windows." Then she was gone.

Now it happened some three weeks later that in her meagerly furnished little room, a pretty girl sat chewing the end of her penholder. On the table before her lay two sheets of paper—one blank, the other covered with a sprawling penmanship which had grown very dear.

At last Jim had told her all the story of the last few months and had quite formally asked her to be his wife. And although, of course, there was never a mention of one Molly Kirkham, still the girl felt that, somehow or other, there was something missing. The spark of fire which had lighted his letters and touched off an answering glow in her heart was gone. Therefore, she chewed the penholder and pondered her reply.

And because the words leaped up suddenly before her eyes. "I've had a telephone installed, Angell, 801 R," she slipped downstairs to the telephone.

"Yes—yes—Shirley! You're going to be married?—to an old friend—Shirley—No, of course it's all right. Why, certainly—No, as a matter of fact, I'm rather glad!"

Jim hung up the receiver to wait for Molly. When she came. "Tell me," he said gently, "why didn't you write to me as Molly, instead of inventing a Shirley whom I nearly fell in love with instead of with you?"

"If I had," retorted Molly, defensively, "what would it have meant—a note from the red-headed Kirkham kid! I had to create a new personality! But how did you find out we were the same?"

"Easy," said Jim. "Any man who doesn't know the voice of the woman he loves, however disguised, doesn't deserve her. Do you know, little girl, when your mother asked me to keep an eye on you I thought you were the greatest liability that went with the business. But I've changed my mind, sweetheart. You're the greatest asset a man could have!"

—Another reason why a girl doesn't mind being flat-chested is because she'd rather put her hair up in curlers every night than have it naturally curly.

The Teacher.
(Monroe Enquirer's)

No matter how many factories may close, no matter how many in other lines may be out of employment, this is a busy time with the teachers and here are not enough of them to meet the demand. The dearest thing in this world is a cheap teacher. And on the other hand there is no class of people who give more for what they receive than do the good faithful teachers in our schools. Fortunately is that child who has a teacher who not only teaches from the text books, but who inculcates great principles and teaches the elements high to make up high character. Give encouragement to the teacher in your school. Visit the school occasionally and see for yourself what the teacher has to contend with. See to it that the teacher has fair play. Do not send to him a numbskull and expect the teacher to turn out a mental giant. The teacher cannot make brains. All the teacher can do is to cultivate and develop the brains furnished. Before you put the tongue-lash of criticism to the teacher be sure that you sent a child a reasonable amount of brain matter to be developed. Many a fool whose children took after him or her in the way of brains has complained bitterly because the child was not properly taught when the whole trouble was not in its teaching, but in its birth.

OPERATION NOT SUCCESSFUL.

"16 years ago I was operated for appendicitis and later operated again for gall stones. Neither did me any good and I suffered all kinds of torture since. Five years ago I took Mayr's Wonderful Remedy and have felt no symptoms or pain since. All stomach sufferers should take it." It is a simple, harmless preparation that removes the catarrhal mucus from the intestinal tract and allays the inflammation which causes practically all stomach, liver and intestinal ailments, including appendicitis. One dose will convince or money refunded. Sold in Oxford by J. N. Pittman and all leading druggists.
