

A NUMEROUS PROGENY.—In the village of Springfield, near Gretna Green, there resides a respectable old woman, named Janet Holthart, of Johnston, who has lived to see her offspring in their fourth generation. Since Janet was dandied on her mother's knee the world has seen some strange mutations. More than one kingdom has begun and ended, and distance has been annihilated by the steam-engine and electric telegraph. Janet had entered her teens before Bonaparte commenced to play his brilliant part in the world's history, and ere Waterloo was fought she had well-nigh reached the middle of life's journey. Though now many years past the allotted span of three-score years and ten, she still retains possession of all her faculties and enjoys good health. She has, as we have said, been spared to see her children and her children's children unto the fourth generation. She is mother to ten grandmothers to forty-nine, great grandmother to forty, and great-great grandmother to one, making in all the very respectable number of 100.—Peebles Advertiser.
