The huts were for the most part of one traditional type, viz., that of an enormous basket with one side knocked out. In fact, were a monster picnic to disperse suddenly, leaving their hampers and lunch baskets scattered around in the dirt, it would represent fairly enough an ordinary African village. A few of the larger hovels had attained the dignity of a roof of corrugated iron stuck on the side like a soldier's cap, while patches of the same material clung to their sides like overgrown postage stamps. The interiors of one and all were fully open to the public gaze, which mattered the less inasmuch as there seemed to be nothing in them except two or three cracked pots and a tiny fire. The room in which Mr. Nat Fine Country received us was as extraordi-nary as the name and appearance of its owner. It had no roof, and might almost he said to have no floor, either, consisting as it did of a crazy wooden platform around its four sides, with a deep hollow in the middle, the whole thing being ex-tremely suggestive of a public swimming bath. ## DESCRIPTION.

The cre to be treated passes by means of an automatic feed through the hopper to the stationary disk, the bottom of which is covered with a series of broken rifles. Directly beneath this disk is a revolving pan containing a resorvoir of vuick of an inch of the bottom of the revolving pan, upon bottom of which the quicksil-ver spreads and forms a wall round the periphery. A very thin stream of water suffices to moisten the sand or ore ere it falls through the hopper into the center of the pan, where it is forced backwards and forwards between and under the riffles; by bis process the gold is freed from the sand or quartz by difference in specific gravity, and so brighten it that it will immediately amalgamate in coming in contact with the near ary, liself kept bright by the action of the rifles. Any particles not taken up on the surface of the pan are caught by the wall of quicksilver formed around the periphery by centrifugal force. 29f

I have met with a number of people who never saw a dead goat or a dead mule, but everybody has picked up a pin, and at long intervals seen a dead bird. The puzzle is that, while so many millions of pins and hirds must be gotten away with every day, we find so few of them. By the way, I think I never saw a dead pigeon in my life.-Chicago Journal.
