WILL DO THEIR PART TO HELP

Colored People To Have Big Conservation Rally Day Here on November the 19th.

On Friday after the first Sunday in November, November 9th, the colored people of Warren are to have a big conservation rally in Warrenton.

W. H. Rudd, a government expert in agriculture and conservation, will be present to address the colored farmers, their wives and children.

The meeting is to be held in the Court House, commencing at 11 o'clock. This is the first time in the history of Warren that colored farmers and their wives have had a county-wide meeting to discuss problems of rural life, and this meeting affords an opportunity which should be taken by all colored citizens.

Let Your Dollars Work For Liberty—Buy a bond, a patriotic service.

OUR COUNTY GETS PRIZE AT FAIR

Exhibit In Henderson at Golden Belt Fair Wins Prize of Ten Dollars. Money to Girls.

Warren Wins! That sounds good, and the County won away from home, which is all the more a sign of merit. The Warren County Canning Clubs won the ten dollars in gold at the Golden Belt Fair in Henderson Wednesday.

Mrs. Connell, County Canning Agt., has been active throughout the summer and Warren has canned more fruit than ever before. It is a tribute to the efforts of Mrs. Connell and her Canning Clubs that they won at Henderson, and the County is proud of the distinction.

The prize money, as Mrs. Connell informs us, is to be divided among the girls who contributed to the exhibit.

Attend the Farmers Rally in Warrenton Saturday. Problems of interest and importance are to be discussed

DR. TAYLOR'S OLD TIMES IN WARREN

Interesting Incidents and Side-lights on the Life of Gen. "Stonewall" Jackson.

Warren people, like all others, are interested in everything that concerns the great Confederate General "Stonewall" Jackson.

interesting gentleman, Mr. J. W. Chalmers, who has come to enrich our town with his genial presence, I learned several "Stonewall" Jackson incidents, which I do not think have ever been in print.

At the beginning of the War Between the States, Major Jackson, now known by all the world as Stonewall, was a professor in the Virginia Military Institute, where Mr. Chalmers was at that time a student.

When the State of Virginia passed the ordinance of Secession, the Governor ordered Major Jackson to leave Lexington with the corps of cadets the next day at one o'clock, and proceed to Harper's Ferry. Everything was in readiness to move at twelve o'clock, and the President of the institution suggested to Major Jackson that he would as well start.

"My instructions," said the great soldier, "fixed the hour of departure at one o'clock, and I shall not move until then."

Absolute obedience to orders was the rule of Jackson's life. He rendered obedience to those in authority over him, and he exacted obedience from all his subordinates. In punishing disobedience, he was as inflexible as a bar of iron. This was one of the secrets of his wonderful success.

Jackson was no ladies' man. This was well known among his friends, and when he was seen in company with a lady, it was well understood that she was self invited.

An incident occurred, on one occasion during the war which showed that there were occasions when he could welcome a lady with great heartiness.

The famous Confederate Spy, Belle Boyd, on whom Jackson depended for much of the information on which he acted, was scouting for him within the lines of the enemy. She was captured, and was held a prisoner, in a private house. Her guard was commanded, by an interesting, young Lieutenant, who endeavored to make himself very agreeable to the fair rebel. She seemed to become very much offended at something he said, and came very near slapping his face; and turned from him and ran upstairs * * * *

General Jackson and his men were resting. The men lying around on the ground, heard a horse rapidly approaching down the hillside. Presently they saw that the horse was ridden by a girl, who dashed into their midst, dismounted and approached General Jackson, who as soon as he saw her hurried forth to meet her, and grasping her little hand in his unusually large one, greatly amused the boys by the cordial reception he gave her. He talked with her very eagerly for a few minutes, and grasping her little hand again bade her goodbye. She sprang lightly on her horse, and hurried off up the mountain side. * * * *

When Belle Boyd, in a seeming fit of anger, left the Lieutenant and ran up-stairs she did not go to her room, but leaving the house by a rear stairway, mounted her horse and hurried away to carry her information to Jackson. Having accomplished this, she hastened back to her prison and joined the Lieutenant and her guards, while the great soldier, acting on the information she gave him, doubtless made one of those rapid flank movements which greatly surprised the enemy and won for his men the well-earned name "Jackson's Foot Cavalry"

Another incident illustrates the striking dissimilarity of the two great chieftains, Lee and Jackson. Jackson was separated from Lee by a river which was very much swollen by recent rains. Jackson was on the side of the enemy, and Lee desiring to communicate with him called one of his couriers and said:

"Here is a dispatch that I desire to send by you to General Jackson. He is on the other side of that river, and you see it is greatly swollen. Do you think you can cross it safely?"

"Yes, sir, I think I can," said the courier.

"How do you purpose crossing?"

inquired the General. "Will you plunge in here, and swim straight across?"

"No," replied the courier, "I will go a considerable distance up the stream, and depend on the current to carry me down to the landing on the other side."

"Yes, that's right," said General Lee. "I will send some men up stream with you to help you, if you should have trouble. Now, here is the dispatch. Deliver it to General Jackson yourself. Be careful, and do not let 'those people' get you." He always spoke of the Yankees as "those people."

The courier saluted and hurried away. He crossed the river safely and reached Jackson's camp. He enquired of a soldier, "Where is General Jackson's headquarters?"

"General Jackson has no headquarters," laughed the man; "but yonder he sits studying a map by the light of the fire."

The courier approached and delivered the dispatch to the General, who received it, and curtly said, "stand aside." He read the dispatch and rapidly wrote a reply, and calling the courier said:

"Take this to General Lee at once."

"General," said the courier, "General Lee instructed me to request you to send your reply by one of your couriers. I have been on duty many hours."

"Take this dispatch, and return with it to General Lee at once," sternly commanded Jackson, "or I will put you under arrest!"

When the courier delivered the dispatch to General Lee, he received it; and, after reading it said; "I thought I sent word by you to General Jackson to send his reply by one of his own couriers."

"You did," General, "but General Jackson ordered me to return with it, or he would put me under arrest."

"Ah, well," said General Lee, "I might have expected it; but never mind, I will give you a ten days furlough that you may rest and recuperate."

TUESDAY NIGHT AT COURT HOUSE

Red Cross Officers Are Re-elected at Meeting Tuesday Night Mr. Polk Makes Address.

On account of the inclemency of the weather many were unable to attend the Red Cross meeting in the Court House on Tuesday night, which was called primarily for the purpose of electing officers, but it is certain that those present expressed the will of the Chapter when they re-elected the same officers, under whom the Chapter has been active.

Miss Esther Jerman, chairman; Mrs. Peter Arrington, vice-chairman and Miss Laura Burwell, secretary-treasurer were all unanimously elected to guide the affairs of the Chapter for another year.

Mr. Tasker Polk made an impressive address on "Why we are at war", showing that the same principles were at stake for which our forefather bled and died in establishing America; the land of the free; that America was a factor to be counted in the world struggle and that it had entered the war with its characteristic spirit to see it through to an enduring peace.

Mr. Polk's address was interesting, helpful, inspiring, and his audience was thoroughly attentive.
