

Journal Says Parents Are Often Confused

Youth's Companion. The parents of young children usually view with complacency the determination of their offspring to have their own way. They may not let them have it, but they comment approvingly on the strength of character indicated by tenacity, however disagreeably it may be expressed.

"He has such a strong will," the mother exclaims with satisfaction. "He'll know what he wants, and he'll go after it," agrees the father. "Pretty good trait."

It is not unlikely that, as the years go on, many of these inexperienced and prejudiced parents will continue to confuse strength of desire with strength of will. But strength of desire does not always imply strength of will. If, as is often the result under improper direction, it leads to self-indulgence, it certainly does not produce strength of will. The self-willed person is usually the one least given to practicing self-control; and there is no better test of the strength of a man's will than the degree to which he practices self-control. The will to attain is an excellent trait, but it can only be developed if with it there is developed equally the power to forgo.

Therefore the fathers and mothers who rejoice over their children's manifestations of a strong purpose to possess themselves of whatever they want may be rejoicing prematurely. The wisdom or unwisdom of their guidance is likely to determine whether the child in whom they have such pride grows up self-willed, self-indulgent and ineffectual, or strong-willed, resolute and capable.

Former Member of Court Dies Poor Scrubwoman

Ramsgate, England, Dec. 14.—Once the hostess in an Embassy, accustomed to receive the homage of brilliant throngs in a foreign capital; in her last years reduced to earn her bread as a scrubwoman—these are the phases in the life of a mystery woman who has just died in this town. "Mrs. Annie Smith," the name by which she chose to be known, came here about three years ago and lived alone in the tiny cottage where her body was found, half dressed, lying on the floor of her bedroom.

She was clearly a woman of refinement and high education. The incongruity of her attainments with her humble occupation aroused intense curiosity, but she repulsed all inquiries regarding her past life. Once or twice, however, in speaking recently to neighbors, she let it slip that her husband had been a Member of Parliament and at one time an Ambassador.

To the end, however, she refused to disclose her real identity and intensive police inquiries failed to reveal it.

Only nine per cent of the nation's cities with over 500,000 population. Thirty-three per cent are in towns with less than 1,000 people.
