WHY SANTA CLAUS WAS LATE

By TASKER POLK

Donder and Blitzen were both taken sick
Just as the sleigh was brought out for St. Nick:
The drums and the horns and the soldiers of tin,
The dolls and the balls and the bats were all in,
And William's red top with its long leather string,
And Mary's piano with a doll that could sing,
And an air ship for James, and a long train of cars,
And an angel that came straight down from the stars:
In fact, everything you could think of was there,
Even down to a bicycle for dear little Fair!
When Santa found out his two coursers were sick,
He reared and he pitched and he talked mighty quick:
"Go bring me two more," he thundered aloud,
"The slickest and quickest you've got in the crowd!"
And old Mrs. Santa she hurried around,
And she fussed and she fussed and she fumed and she frowned,
But at last she picked out the first two in the row
Which had lately been caught in a drift in the snow;
And one was named Cook, a quiet young fellow,
And one was named Peary, who did nothing but bellow.
And when they were hitched up already to go,
They both began kicking and pawing the snow,
While Santa cried out "By the breath of my soul
"You are both arrant fakirs and have ne'er seen the pole,
"But you'll feel one right now," and he puffed and he whacked,
While they leaped and they bucked and they balked and they backed.
As last he unhitched them, sprang into the sleigh,
And with only six reindeer he darted away.
In spite of the fact he was a little bit late
And had only six coursers instead of the eight,
He is coming, my darlings, right royally on.
And soon, we will hear the blast of his horn.
Into bed! into bed! before he arrives,
For miles fly like feathers when Santa Claus drives.
