

Today and Tomorrow

celebration They have been holding a celebration in Washington for the centennial of the American patent system. I wish I could take time out for the U. S. Patent Office. I was one of my playgrounds. I was a boy and my uncle was Commissioner of Patents. I think, from the experience of models of early inventions I ever learned in school. Many folks have a wrong idea of patents. They think they are made to create monopolies. The opposite is true. The word "patent" means "to make public." It returns for disclosing the secret of a device or process so that anyone can use it. Uncle Sam gives the inventor the sole right to use it for fourteen years. After that it is public property. America is one of the few countries where the owner of a patent does not have to pay an annual tax. That is one of the reasons why we are the most inventive people in the world. The other is that we had to invent machines to do our work because we wanted to do more work than there were men to do it.

the public In 1844 Henry L. Ellsworth, then Commissioner of Patents, in his annual report to Congress said that the Patent Office would soon be necessary, since there was nothing much left to invent! Just a few inventions since then are the telephone, electric light, gas engine, airplane, motion picture, radio, and gramophone. A million and a half other inventions for which patents have been issued since Mr. Ellsworth's time.

power From time immemorial inventors have been trying to find some way of harnessing the energy of sun heat. In many countries it is easy to get tanks of water by the sun's rays and many patents have been granted on solar engines. Most of these, however, cost so much in proportion to the power generated that they don't pay to build them. Dr. Charles G. Abbott, secretary of the Smithsonian Institute of Washington, however, thinks he has solved the problem. At the Patent Office he showed an engine that is a sunpump which may point the way toward conservation of fuel from the earth's supplies of coal and oil.

under control One of the most promising of the inventions shown at the Patent Centennial is a method of taking the glare out of automobile headlights. Scientists have long known that light can be "polarized" that is, so reflected that the light beams are parallel and go in one direction only. But all previous methods of doing this have been expensive and cumbersome for general use.

death ray Another amazing new thing is a device which produces sound waves of a pitch too high for the human ear to detect. These vibrations, or "ultrasonic" sounds have remarkable powers of penetration and can even raise death. Dr. R. W. Wood of John Hopkins laboratory, who developed them, showed how passing these ultrasonic waves through a tank of water would kill all the fish in the water. That suggests a possible use in killing the larvae of mosquitoes in their breeding places. Amazing new industrial compounds can also be found by these waves. Oil can be mixed with water, and powdered coal which has been suspended in water is consolidated into a solid lump by means of the sound vibrations.
