N. C. Farm People Lag Behind Urban People In Schooling

North Carolina farm people, like their counterparts on the national level, continue to lag behind urban and rural nonfarm people in education. Census figures show 22 per cent of the farm people in North Carolina 25 years old and over have less than a fifth grade education.

This compares with 17.5 per cent of the rural nonfarm and 13.1 per cent of the urban. In the state 16.5 per cent of all people 25 and older didn't advance through the fifth grade.

This gap between urban-rural nonfarm and rural farm has not narrowed in the past decade for the nation as a whole, the census report points out.

Nationally, the gap between urban whites and farm whites is about 15 per cent. Between rural nonfarm and rural farm the difference is about five per cent. About 32 per cent of the rural white people 25 and over have completed high school.

In North Carolina the median year of school completed for urban whites is 11.5. For rural nonfarm whites it is 9.1 and for rural farm whites it is 8.1—a gap between urban and farm of almost three and one-half years.

By breaking the figures down by sex, it is shown that North Carolina females, (white and nonwhite) 25 and over are better educated than the males.

The urban women have completed 11.8 years of school and the men 10 years. Rural nonfarm women have finished nine years and the men 8.7.

The median year of school completed by farm females is 8.1 as compared with 7.3 for the farm males. For all people of the state 25 and older, the median year of school completed is 8.9, or less than junior high school.

Skimmed milk or dry skim milk contains just as much protein as whole milk, but a glass of skim has only 90 calories compared with 125 for whole milk.
