GARDEN TIME
M. E. Gardner
N. C. State College

We have had more than our usual share of rain until now (May 8) and it has been well distributed. As I mentioned in a recent column, it has been necessary to mow lawns about every 5 days instead of the usual once a week.

It would be asking too much for this even, and adequate, distribution of rainfall to continue. So the question arises, how often should I irrigate?

This question cannot be answered with any degree of authority because too many factors are involved. The amount of water your soil will hold, and the rate at which certain crops take water from the soil are two of the most important.

Let us consider these two factors and maybe you will have a better idea of the amount and frequency of application of irrigation water.

First, the water holding capacity of your soil:

The sandy and dandy loam soils will hold approximately 0.5 to 1.4 inches of water per foot of soil, the loamy types from 1.3 to 2.1 inches, and the clays from 1.4 to 2.4 inches of water per foot of soil.

From these figures it is apparent that crops growing under Sandhills conditions would require more irrigation water than the same crops growing in the heavy clays of the Piedmont.

Now a few examples of the rate of use of water by certain plants:

Let's consider the months of May through August. During this period most of the flowers and such crops as lettuce, mustard, kale and spinach will use water at the rate of about .14 inches per day. During the same period azaleas, camellias, nursery crops and such vegetables as tomatoes, sweet corn, okra and cantaloupes will require approximately .16 inches of water per day from the soil.

The figures are based on the best information available and take into consideration temperature, wind movement, humidity and light intensity.

While this does not answer the question completely, it does give some basis for figuring the water requirements of certain plants growing in different soil types.

The karri trees, eucalypts of southwest Australia, grow nearly 300 feet tall and measure 10 feet across at the base, the National Geographic says.
