CORN GUIDE FOR PROFIT

Growing corn isn't anything new to a farmer who has been in the business very long, but growing corn for profit is something of a new idea to some Warren County farmers. Since tractors replaced mules, the milkman from the family cow out of business and giant "egg factories" rendered the barnyard chicken flock economically unsound, more corn has been produced to sell for profit rather than for on-the-farm use. Proper seed and soil selection, correct rates and placement of fertilizer, insect and disease control and timely harvesting are all ingredients of growing corn for profit. These steps are explained in detail in a new publication by the North Carolina Agricultural Extension Service entitled, "Growing Corn for Profit," Circular 469. One of the relatively newer production practices covered in the publication is the use of pre-emergence and post-emergence herbicides to control weeds and grasses. Such plant pests as cocklebur, morning glory and others can be controlled chemically, contributing significantly to the farmer's chances of achieving high yields and higher profits. The publication is available at County Agricultural Extension Offices.
