North Carolina corn yields increased 350 per cent from 1940 to 1965, and tobacco and peanut yields were more than doubled.

When "instant" foods are mentioned, most people think about preparations to which some liquid is added, such as milk or water, the mixture stirred and it is ready for cooking and serving.

Comparatively few people, however, think of canned or frozen foods as also being instant. Yet, what could be more instant than a tree-ripened peach fresh from the can? Or fresh frozen North Carolina strawberries made into a short cake or liberally sprinkled over ice cream?

I have called to your attention the research conducted at N. C. State University which resulted in the development of dehydrated sweet potato flakes, dehydrated pumpkin flakes and dehydrated pumpkin pie mix. As a result of this research, two commercial plants have begun operation in North Carolina and three plants in other states. Now, we have fruit pellets.

In this process the fruit is reduced to a puree, and droplets are injected into a refrigerant. The frozen droplets are then dehydrated by a process called freeze-drying, resulting in the formation of instant pellets. These pellets can be eaten out-of-hand, like popcorn, as they have a very crunchy texture. They can also be used in a variety of other ways. They may be mixed with cereals, ice cream, cottage cheese or candy to give a fresh fruit flavor. Or they may be incorporated into prepared mixes for cakes, muffins, pancakes and or baked products.

Not all of the research has been focused on the dehydrated forms of foods. Freezing has come in for its share of research, too. One of the most pressing problems in freezing fruits has been the blanching process. The function of blanching is to remove air from the product and at the same time to inactivate certain enzyme systems which may cause spoilage. This important process involves rather large pieces of expensive equipment.

After several years of research, a continuous vacuum system has been developed employing hydrostatic legs. This system is cheaper to install, requires less floor space and gives a more uniform product with higher quality.

Norman Miller, extension specialist in Food Science, tells me that one of the most pressing needs of the canning industry is to reduce the cooking time necessary to sterilize pulse products such as mashed sweet potatoes and pumpkin. It is indicated that re-designing the tin can appears to be the answer. Research is continuing.

The next time you select a can, package or pouch of processed foods, you might pause a moment to think about the endless hours of research necessary to make the product instantly available for the housewife.
