Growing Tomatoes In Greenhouse

Many Tar Heel farmers and gardeners are taking on a new challenge. They are trying to grow tomatoes in the dead of winter with the aid of plastic greenhouses.

Some of these growers are producing fine greenhouse tomatoes. Others are having disease problems.

Dr. Charles W. Averre, an extension plant pathologist at North Carolina State University, said leafminers are one of the biggest problems. While leafminers are an insect, they help diseases to get started.

"Hold a tomato leaf up to the light and you can see the tunnels that leafminers make," Dr. Averre said.

Leafminers are difficult to control, but Malathion used as directed on the label will help.

Leafspots - early blight, leaf mold and grey leafspot - can also damage greenhouse tomatoes. These diseases, which are caused by fungi, can be controlled by Maneb plus Zinc sprays. Examples are Manzate D and Dithane M22 Special. Be sure to cover all plant surfaces in using these sprays, Averre said. Power sprayers are usually required. Also, be sure to follow label directions.

Averre said the greenhouse atmosphere should be kept as dry as possible as a means of reducing the severity of leafspot diseases. He also suggested that all plant trash and dead leaves be removed from the house.

"Good sanitation practices are a must in any tomato greenhouse operation," the plant pathologist stated.

Wilt may be a problem in some greenhouses. Once the tomatoes are growing, however, little can be done to help this problem.

If a grower will do his pruning by pinching instead of by cutting with a knife, he may be able to reduce the spread of the wilt diseases. Also, county extension agents may be able to help next year in selecting wilt-resistant varieties of tomatoes. But this possibility depends on the type of wilt present.

Dr. Averre said virus diseases have also been noticed in some greenhouses. Again, prevention offers more hope than cures.

Guard against the use of tobacco products in the greenhouse or around the plants, Dr. Averre said. Tobacco can contain the virus that cause tobacco mosaic and certain diseases of tomato plants. Eliminating weeds around the greenhouse before the crop is planted is another way of reducing the possibility of virus infections.

Root-knot nematodes can be a problem, but as with viruses and wilts, little can be done to control nematodes on established plants. Fumigation before planting is the answer to the problem.

Dr. Averre said that greenhouse operators can get excellent information on diseases and other problems from their county agricultural extension agent.

"Remember," he added, "that tomato greenhouse operations require a great deal of attention to pest control and sanitation in addition to good management."
